Airborne delivers challenge

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

With air freight carriers expected to spend about $160 million on tv advertising this year to push their overnight services, the challenge to market leader Federal Express is intensifying.

And Airborne Freight, one of at least 21 companies in the hot market, is issuing the strongest verbal challenge to the Memphis-based leader.

Airborne, a Seattle company that was not advertising as recently as three years ago, today breaks a $14 million campaign by Della Femina, Travisano & Partners, New York, that features a fast-talking woman, Airborne's answer to Federal's motor-mouth commercial star John Moschitta.

In another spot, an Airborne employe holds up both Federal and Airborne overnight envelopes and challenges the viewer to see which service gets delivered first.

The challenge spot will run on network tv, while Airborne's fast-talker spot, featuring Amy Ivy, is breaking in 15 major markets.

Federal, for its part, recently broke Ally & Gargano's new $25 million campaign—minus Mr. Moschitta—to ask the question: "Why fool around with anyone else?"

While Airborne believes it has reached parity with Federal in terms of service capability, the company is lagging in the number of actual packages shipped overnight.

It is a tight pack behind Federal, with Airborne, the U.S. Postal Service's Express Mail, Emery Worldwide and Purolator Courier all vying for position No. 2.

As for direct Airborne vs. Federal comparisons, for the three months ended June 30, Airborne carried approximately 1.9 million shipments domestically, an average of 29,800 shipments a day. This was an increase of about 8,000 packages per day from the same period last year, when Airborne shipped about 1.4 million packages, or approximately 22,000 packages per day.

During the same three-month period this year, Federal shipped 191,000 pieces a day, an increase of 50,000 over the company's

Ford will add 2 foreign cars to '85 lineup

By RALPH GRAY and JESSE SNYDER

DETROIT—Ford Motor Co. is set to reap the U.S. marketing fruits of its overseas operations. At least two new cars will cross the oceans to add some punch to Ford's domestic lineup.

They are the Sierra XR4 from Ford of Europe and a version of the Australian Telstar, which is to be modified for the U.S. and made in Mexico.

The European Sierra will carry the XR4 designation in its as-yet-unselected name. It will be marketed by the Lincoln-Mercury division in model year 1985—bowing about a year from now—as a separate brand from the current Lincoln and Mercury labels.

Young & Rubicam, the Lincoln-Mercury agency, is expected to handle advertising for both the Sierra and the Telstar.

Telstar is an offspring of the Ford-Toyo Kogyo marriage in Australia. Ford owns 25% of Toyo Kogyo, and nowhere is the relationship more meaningful than Down Under.

The Telstar is actually the Mazda 626; Mazda is the Toyo Kogyo brand name.

The Telstar, which will replace Mercury's Capri (and may get the Capri name), is front-wheel drive with a five-speed transmission and other goodies like rack-and-pinion steering and four-wheel indepen-

FCB, NCK merging; unsure of Altschiller

By NANCY MILLMAN

CHICAGO—Foote, Cone & Belding Communications, in a move chief executive officer Norman W. Brown says will "double our size and strength in Europe, Canada and Mexico," is acquiring NCK Organization.

NCK, which Mr. Brown called the "fastest-growing international agency," will be merged into FCB. The NCK name will disappear.

The agreement in principle calls for an exchange of stock.

Publicly held FCB posted 1982 billings of $1.2 billion and revenues of $179.9 million, ranking it 10th among worldwide agencies.

NCK had worldwide billings of $433.5 million in 1982 and gross income of $69.8 million, which included its New York operation, Altschiller, Reitzfeld, Solin/NCK.

However, as FCB was announcing the merger Friday, Darrol B. Solin, president of ARS, was announcing a decision "to end the two-year business relationship" be-

Status of exclusivity probe unclear

Stroh gets tv sports time

By CRAIG REISS

Stroh Brewery Co., which had charged the tv networks with illegally selling product exclusivities to advertisers in sports coverage, has made major buys of prime sports programing on all three networks and in two syndicated sports properties.

Stroh last week signed deals to sponsor on a nonexclusive basis "Monday Night Baseball" on ABC in 1984, two Larry Holmes heavyweight championship boxing matches on NBC this year and the "International Racing of Champions" auto race series on CBS next spring.

Stroh also is participating in National Football League games this fall, and it purchased a sponsorship on National Collegiate Athletic Assn. football games, both on CBS.

In addition, the Detroit-based brewery will have major sponsorships in "The Kickoff Classic" college football game tonight, syndicated by Katz Sports, and the pre-Olympics faceoff between the U.S. and Russian amateur hockey teams on Dec. 9.

It is unclear whether these buys will put an end to Stroh's request for a U.S. Justice Department investigation of network practices, or its own threat to sue the tv networks for restraint of trade.

A source at Justice said a decision on whether to proceed with an investigation could be made this week.

While Stroh, claiming that it was prepared to spend $60 million in prime network tv live sports if only it was given a chance, has now broken through the exclusivity barrier in some network sports, sources close to the company still wonder whether the restraint of trade issue has been settled.

These sources contend that the networks, especially ABC, took advantage of the tight Olympic year bud-

Get ready for almond butter

By JENNIFER PENDLETON

Is America ready to try an alternative to peanut butter?

California's growing almond industry believes the answer is yes. If that's so, then it may mean the start of a new industry.

With predictions the state's almond production will double within three years from today's 260 million lbs., the largest U.S. almond packer is trying to devlop new uses for the nut. Almond butter is considered its best prospect.

California Almond Growers Exchange, Sacramento, and several other regional manufacturers have been marketing almond butter at health food stores, specialty retail outlets and by mail.

The exchange soon will start an experiment to determine if almond butter can hold its own against peanut butter on supermarket shelves.

In two to five undisclosed western cities, the almond growers' group will test-market two varieties of its Blue Diamond brand almond butter in supermarkets.

CAGE officials will monitor the test to see if

Pro league, Tanner halt tv package

New York—The new International Football League and William B. Tanner Co. mutually agreed to terminate their letter of agreement on tv rights.

IFL officials could not be reached for comment at press time, but a Tanner executive in Memphis said that no reason was being disclosed.

When asked if the Tanner feasibility study on the embryonic league's chances for spring-summer competition with the U.S. Football League, and on the viability of a $21 million first-year rights fee, were factors, the Tanner official said only that the dollar sum "never was hard and fast," but rather was simply "a starting point."

As for the FBI's investigation into Tanner operations (AA, Aug. 15, et seq.), the Tanner executive said: "I don't think there's any connection." He added that he had never heard the subject mentioned during negotiations with IFL officials.

Meanwhile, FBI agents started poring over the more than 30 boxes of materials they seized from Tanner's office. They are looking for evidence to support allegations by former employes that company president William Tanner paid kickbacks to clients and engaged in tax fraud.

Mr. Tanner has denied any wrongdoing.

Media General, the Tanner parent company, also has its own full-scale investigation into the company's practices underway.

Alan Donnahoe, chief executive officer of Media General, said the Richmond, Va.-based media conglomerate has just started to go through the voluminous files. It was granted access to the seized documents Aug. 18.

"I'm not even sure if we have them all copied yet," Mr. Donnahoe said, adding that all the material had been turned over to the company's lawyers for an "independent and thorough investigation.

"This is a very complex matter," he said, explaining that it may be "quite some time" before any conclusions can be reached. "It could be weeks and it could be months," Mr. Donnahoe said.

It also is not clear how quickly the FBI's investigation will move. No charges have been filed, and there was no indication from officials at the bureau's Memphis offices whether any soon would be.

After it examines the Tanner files, the FBI may find

'Coffee generation' ads set

By SUSAN SPILLMAN

New York—The National Coffee Assn.'s long-awaited advertising campaign aimed at turning the "Pepsi generation" on to coffee (AA, Feb. 14), finally breaks Sept. 11.

In its attempt to reverse a 20-year decline in coffee consumption, the yearlong $24 million campaign will use tv exclusively—much of it cable—with buys targeted to programs that are popular with young adults.

Neither the association nor its agency, Advertising to Women, would discuss the coming commercials. "That's the way it is in advertising; you don't want everyone else to know what you're doing," explained Hilary Hinchman, vp-media director at ATW.

But it was learned that one of the first spots to air will be a fast-paced, quick-cut, life-style montage that shows young people involved in a variety of activities, including studying and playing basketball, and a young tv anchorwoman as she is spruced up before airtime.

One of the shots is of author Kurt Vonnegut, who has a large campus following.

The commercial is set to upbeat rock music, over which the announcer says: "You are the new American society. . .the new coffee generation."

The 30-second spot goes on to say that coffee "picks you up and calms you down" and ends with the message: "Join the coffee achievers."

As reported earlier, subsequent spots are believed to feature sports stars, including Cincinnati Bengals' quarterback Ken Anderson and marathon runner Allison Roe.

Fifty-two-week buys have been made on all three networks and three syndicated shows: "Thicke of the Night," "Solid Gold" and "Fame," plus three cable services: MTV: Music Television, USA Cable Network's "Night Flight" series and superstation WTBS' "Night Tracks."

Spots will break on the broadcast networks first, followed later in the month by the syndicated and cable shows.

In addition to its spots on MTV, the coffee group will be tagged on the channel's hot line, a toll-free 800 number that viewers call to receive updated concert information.

On USA Cable, the association will

Coupon fee hikes seen from study

By NANCY GIGES

A report on the cost of coupon handling, to be released Sept. 12, is expected to spur package goods marketers to raise the per-coupon fee to retailers from 7¢ to 10¢.

The increase would cost couponers an estimated $180 million more a year.

The study is being conducted by Arthur Andersen & Co. and financed by several food and grocery trade associations.

Procter & Gamble, Cincinnati, which has led the industry in past handling-fee hikes—from 3¢ to 5¢ in 1974 and from 5¢ to 7¢ in 1980—would not comment on whether it will go to 10¢ soon.

Traditionally, payments to retailers increase following these studies. An official at the Grocery Manufacturers of America, Washington, one of the trade associations financing this effort, said that there has never been an instance before when such a study did not produce a hike.

But, he added, that decision is one made by companies independently, so the association would not be involved. Furthermore, neither the associations nor member companies will receive any advance

The South Carolina senator has his eye on the White House.

Hollings displays his stump style

By JAMES BRADY

"I am a professional politician."

He looks like one. He is tall, silver-haired. Ruggedly handsome. He is in New York meeting with the fat cats and the local pols and the media and trying hard to get something started in a presidential nomination campaign that even he realizes has only just left the starting blocks.

His name is Ernest F. Hollings. He is a senator from South Carolina. Just about everyone calls him "Fritz."

And on this night in Manhattan, he was attempting to convince people that despite Mondale and Glenn and a spasm of undergraduate enthusiasm for Alan Cranston, Hollings is a man who ought to be taken seriously as a Democratic candidate for 1984.

We were in the lush Park Avenue apartment of Pat Lannan, a splendid old Bourbon with ITT and other boardroom connections, drinks in hand and listening to Fritz Hollings talk about himself and his vision of a better America. Mr. Lannan himself was not there; he was at his place in Palm Beach. But his friend, the fashion designer Mary McFadden, and his ITT associate Ned Gerrity, were playing hosts. They'd gathered a fairly impressive cast of Manhattan charac-

Networks plot stunts, 'big event' strategies

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—While NBC-TV did away with the show title "The Big Event" several seasons ago, big events remain a major element in the new fall prime time season.

The Big 3 network programers, even as they juggle premiere dates for fall series and judge which episodes should air earliest (AA, Aug. 22), also are grappling with where to place their major movies, specials and miniseries for greatest ratings and counterprograming impact.

Networks mull positioning on "hot" movies—Page 57

Already, there appears to be a large supply of major nonseries stunts penciled into the November sweeps, with other promising events possibly headed for February.

During February, one agency executive said, "ABC should have the easiest time," given the two weeks set aside for the Winter Olympics, an anticipated A.C. Nielsen Co. ratings blockbuster.

Those contacted at major agencies to discuss network plans emphasized that the shows are only penciled in.

Indeed, some leaks to agency buyers could be intended as trial balloons, if not misinformation to throw rival networks off the track as they set out on their counterprograming maneuvers, agency executives noted.

One early-season entry, "Dempsey," has been slotted by CBS for Sept. 28. The three-hour tv movie about heavyweight champ Jack Dempsey is meant to blunt some series premieres that night.

For Oct. 1, CBS tentatively has slated the Burt Reynolds hit "Cannonball Run" partly opposite the 90-minute premiere of a new NBC series, "The Rousters."

For Oct. 2 and 3, NBC will showcase two reliable, prime time ratings-getters: A one-hour, Dick Clark-hosted "TV's Censored Bloopers" and Johnny Carson's two-hour "Tonight" anniversary special, respectively.

According to various industry executives, CBS has earmarked at least three big theatricals for November: "Rocky II," "Mommie Dearest" and "The Four Seasons."

Petry Television executives have been told that "Mommie Dearest" is set for Nov. 8, followed by "Rocky II" on Nov. 9 and "Four Seasons" on Nov. 22. (The latter also has inspired a midseason series commitment, which CBS might begin soon after the

A publishing veteran is turning his attention from the Sunbelt to the Frostbelt, and will start a regional monthly magazine for New England.

It's estimated he has slightly more than $4 million available from venture capital sources to fund the project.

"It's our notion that New England does have a very strong sense of place that crosses over state lines," Mr. Nylen told ADVERTISING AGE last week. "You can hear

Kodak promo develops ad awareness

By SCOTT HUME

Eastman Kodak's promotional effort launched last month for its disc camera urges consumers to, "Get it while it's hot." Consumers seem to have at least gotten the message.

Kodak's advertising increased significantly in consumer awareness in July, when 422, or 33.8%, of the 1,250 adults polled for July's adWatch survey named Kodak ads as the first to come to mind among all advertisers for cameras and photographic equipment.

The 4.2-point gain in July was not Kodak's largest one-month increase—that came in April when Kodak advertising rose 9.8 points in awareness—but it did boost the company's share of total advertising awareness in the category to its highest level since the survey began in April, 1982.

AdWatch is a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a national random sample of consumers to name the advertising that first comes to mind of all seen, heard or read during the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,250 people were questioned by phone from July 1 through 21. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered a statistically significant change attributable to more than variations in the sample itself.

Candy makers want no tricks

By GAY JERVEY

Candy marketers and their industry associations are inaugurating intensive efforts to make sure that trick-or-treating—and the candy sales it inspires—will not suffer in the lingering wake of last year's scares.

For many marketers, last October become a nightmare as parents kept their ghosts and hobgoblins at home because of the Tylenol poisoning deaths in Chicago.

Candy sales suffered—down 10% to 25%, depending upon the area. Halloween sales normally account for some $1.5 billion of an annual industry total of $5.4 billion.

The incidence of actual candy tamperings turned out to be minimal last year. But banner headlines on the subject caused fears to run high, particularly in the Northeast, the West and other urban pockets.

As a result, for Halloween, 1983, the candy companies began preparing months ago, first through their principal associations, the National Confectioners Assn., the Chocolate Manufacturers Assn. of the USA and the National Candy Wholesalers Assn.

"One good thing that has come out of all of this is that the industry is working together like it never has before," said H.J. Bornhofft, president of Nabisco Confections and an active association leader.

The coalition has enlisted the aid of well-known psychologist Dr. Joyce Brothers as spokeswoman for its drive to make Halloween fun again.

Dr. Brothers will appear in public service spots currently being distributed to 300 stations. She will also tour major cities in October, taking her message to talk shows and the like.

Dr. Brothers will discuss the "psychology of Halloween," explained Dick O'Connell, president last month (AA, July 4), represented a revised marketing strategy for the product.

Kodak's initial advertising for the disc camera, handled by J. Walter Thompson USA, concentrated on selling the concept of disc photography and the convenience of the camera's self-winding feature in a campaign themed, "The pictures you missed before the disc."

The current campaign, backed by a fattened budget, focuses instead on the fun and ease of summertime picture-taking with the disc camera. Additionally, consumers are offered two free packs of Kodak disc film with their purchase.

The disc camera is not Kodak's only advertised product, of course, although 39 of the respondents naming Kodak in July specifically mentioned the disc. A campaign for the company's new Kodacolor VR 35mm films was launched this month, in addition to continuing support for Kodak processing services.

While the boost in awareness for Kodak advertising was significant, it was not the largest gain recorded last month. That distinction belongs to Ford Motor Co.

After a gain of 7.3 points in May, awareness of the auto maker's advertising slipped 2.8 points in June. Last month, however, Ford regained that lost ground (and then some) with a 4.9 point advance.

In July, Ford's advertising, also handled by JWT, came to mind first for 294, or 23.5%, of the survey respondents. That marked a new high score for Ford, giving its advertising awareness a share more than twice that of No. 2 Chevrolet, which increased slightly to 11% in July. Toyota remained No. 3 with 7% of responses.

Ford continues its dramatic tv campaign for its new compact Tempo, featuring the car moving inside the "O" of a huge Tempo sign. That campaign broke in May—when awareness jumped 7.3 points—and still appears to be capturing consumer attention.

In other categories last month:

- A 4.3-point increase in awareness to 9.4% for Trans World Airlines' advertising moved it to third place in the airlines category, the first time it has placed among the top three. Displaced was American Airlines, whose awareness fell 2.6 points to 9%, to No. 4. Eastern Air Lines remained No. 1 with 17.8, although No. 2 United Airlines closed the gap with a 2.2-point rise to 16.2%.
- Lipton followed its strong showing in the coffee & tea category in June (when its ad awareness led the field with a 4.5-point jump) with its third consecutive increase last month, good enough to tie Maxwell House for the No. 2 spot. Lipton's 3-point rise in July gave it a 16.6% share of mentions, twice the 8.3% share for its advertising in April.

The summer campaign with tennis star Chris Evert Lloyd as spokeswoman for its iced-tea mix sweetened with G.D. Searle & Co.'s NutraSweet continues to build awareness. Folger's regained the No. 1 position it had relinquished last month to Maxwell House with a 3.8-point rise to 19.4%.

- Tide's advertising increased its dominance in the laundry products category with a 4-point improvement to 31.6% of mentions. Tide, from Procter & Gamble, has held the No. 1 spot every month, but its share of responses in July was its largest ever. P&G's Cheer moved up a rank to No. 2 with a 1.2-point rise to 5.4%; its Era brand held the No. 3 spot with 3%.
- With hot weather in most of the country, awareness of advertising for both Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola showed gains, but Coke had the better of the two to remain No. 1 in the soft drinks category. Both also registered their highest shares ever as Coke increased 3.5 points to 28.8% and Pepsi rose 2.7 points to 25% of first mentions. Seven-Up remained No. 3 with 8.1%.
- A heavily backed campaign for its new Happy Cat cat food helped boost awareness of Ralston Purina Co.'s advertising 3.2 points to 11.4% and put it for the first time in the No. 1 spot in the pet food category. Allen Products' Alpo, which had held the top spot since October, fell to No. 2 with 9.8%. Purina's Meow Mix held fairly steady with 4.6% in third position.
- Even a 3.3-point decline to 11.1% did not dislodge General Foods' Birds Eye from its hold on the No. 1 spot in the frozen foods category. Green Giant held on to No. 2 with a 1-point gain to 5.8%. Swanson's 5.7% share, up from 4.1% in June, kept it in the No. 3 spot.
- No doubt Wendy's hoped for more dramatic results, but its hard-hitting campaign launched in June did result in some increase in ad awareness in the fast-food category. Its 6.1% share of first mentions in July was 2.3 points better than June's 3.8% and its largest share ever. McDonald's advertising also rose 2.3 points in consumer awareness last month to 46.9%, while Burger King fell 1.2 points to 16.8%.#

To fee or not to fee

By Merle Kingman

Most agency chiefs believe that the 15% commission system will never die, despite a survey by the Assn. of National Advertisers showing an increase in fee arrangements.

That is the conclusion of an Advertising Age Magazine survey of agency chief executives who were asked whether they believed that the erosion of 15% commissions reported by the ANA (AA, April 25) would continue and that fees eventually will prevail.

Of 29 top agency chiefs replying, 18 said no, fees will not prevail, while 11 said yes, they will. In the larger group, many ad chiefs believed that fees, although not prevailing, will continue to serve as a supplement to commissions.

John G. Avrett, president and chairman, Avrett, Free & Ginsberg, New York, stated the most common argument for 15%: "It is just easier to deal with for most clients," he said.

Robert F. Laws, president, Eisaman, Johns & Laws, Los Angeles, said he believes that some clients who oppose commissions actually want fees that exceed 15%—"they want more service than 15% will provide." The others who balk at commissions don't really oppose the system—"they simply want to pay less than 15%," he contended.

"But it isn't a question of more or less than 15%," he added. "It is a question of more or less service than 15% will cover. There is no future for the client who simply wants to pay less than 15%. His agency must do one of two things: Reduce the service—or go broke."

Less income and less service, he maintained, hurt both client and agency. "We have found," he said, "that the fee system adds more work for accountants, lawyers and auditors and puts a damper on creativity and service. There is too much nitpicking and disagreement, too much unproductive work for both groups.

"The best part about the commission system is that it is easy to understand and operates almost automatically. It can be reviewed periodically. Service can be improved or increased. Or concessions can be made. But the commission system actually reduces the chance of friction, which sooner or later can destroy even a productive agency-client relationship."

One argument against fees was that they permit the client to stick its nose into the agency's business a little too closely. Ralph Callahan, president and account services director, Henderson Advertising, Greenville, S.C., argued that the fee system "inevitably gives clients control (direct or indirect) over an agency's conduct of business, i.e., what people, how many, etc."

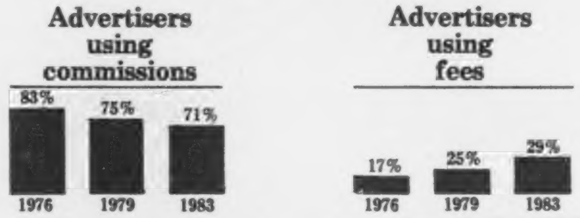
But many advertisers don't want to bother with any such control, O. Milton Gossett suggested. Mr. Gossett, chairman and chief executive officer of Saatchi & Saatchi Compton Worldwide, New York, said: "The future of 15% is assured by the advantages it offers to large advertisers who require the full range of agency services but have no interest in the agency's cost structure."

The ANA study showing commissions losing ground drew criticism. John Kinsella, president, Leo Burnett Co., Chicago, asserted that the study "really doesn't tell the whole story. It's based on the number of advertisers and not advertising dollars spent. The company that spends $100,000 gets the same weight in the survey as a company that spends $100 million.

"Our best available information indicates that 90% of all advertising dollars are spent under the commission [or commission plus fee] system. We think this will continue." Mr. Kinsella sees 15% as the best system for large advertisers and large agencies as—"simple and flexible" and "the most efficient way for an advertiser to employ all the resources of a full-service agencey."

Many agency chiefs stressed that no single system is the answer but that a combination is needed. Raymond J. Sachs, president, VanSant Dugdale & Co., Baltimore, said: "It's in the interest of client and agency to develop alternative compensation to 15%, but fees aren't the answer. What is needed is a floating commission system: There are times when 8% may provide adequate compensation and others when you need 30%."

Fees vs. commissions



A study for the Assn. of National Advertisers indicates that fee compensation is on the rise and commission payments are declining. But agency chiefs surveyed for this article believe the trend will not continue.

The head of one of the nation's largest agencies, who preferred anonymity, endorsed a similar system but termed it a "tailored arrangement." In defense of 15%, he said: "It avoids a 'the meter is running' mentality on the part of both agency and client in the generation of new ideas—ideas that build businesses. It is easy to administer [on both sides] and keeps the focus properly on the most impact from the other 85%.

"While it can be argued that there is not necessarily a relationship between commission income and work effort on any given account, it is even more true that there is no connection between the number of hours an agency spends on an account and the quality of the thinking or the effectiveness of the advertising."

In like manner, Norman Campbell, chairman and ceo, Tracy-Locke/BBDO, Dallas, maintained that "supplemental fees or a floor should be established when commissions are inadequate" and a ceiling (in percentage of income or billing) should be set on commissions or profits when they become excessive. And he added another element: "Outside consultants are being used more and more to negotiate agency compensation."

Others supporting a commission-fee combination included David B. McCall, chairman and creative director, McCaffrey & McCall, New York ("which way you go depends on size and complexity of the account"); R.D. O'Connor, vice-chairman and ceo, Marschalk Campbell-Ewald Worldwide, New York ("many move toward fees but others prefer the commission simply because it's easier"); Louis T. Hagopian, chairman and ceo, N W Ayer, New York ("there's a need for both systems"), and Franklin E. Schaffer, chairman and ceo, Doremus & Co., New York ("the fee trend will continue—slowly—but will not prevail because commissions work well for many accounts").

The minority who saw fees ultimately prevailing were eloquent in their defense. Jack Connors, president. Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos, Boston, said: "Fifty per cent of our income comes from fees or time charges. This is perhaps the highest percentage among the top 100 agencies."

Asserting that the commission system "provides a disincentive" and "encourages mediocrity," Mr. Connors said: "If there is to be new blood, new ideas for successful startups, fees may well be the only hope for newer, smaller agencies. Commissions have no relevance to time, and time—i.e., salaries—is the largest expense at every agency in the world.

"The largest agencies perpetuate the commission system. They can live on thinner margins, satisfied by making them up in volume. The move toward change will not be led by the mighty but, after all, throughout history, the mighty, more often than not, promoted the status quo."

An exception, John O'Toole, chairman, Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, agreed that fees will win out eventually: "Big advertisers feel that 15% results in excess agency profit. On the other hand, 15% isn't sufficient to service many small accounts. It certainly won't cover cable and the new technologies.

"The fee system will foster greater client confidence in agency spending and media recommendations."

Fee proponents invoked professionalism and relevance of compensation to service. Pushing professionalism, Harold J. Shoup, president, Carr Ligget, Cleveland, explained: "Commissions may be acceptable for agencies doing only media advertising, but there are fewer and fewer of these agencies. The stature of the industry will improve greatly when we are compensated on a professional service basis."

Arthur E. Earley, chairman, Meldrum & Fewsmith, Cleveland, agreed: "Large advertisers, heavy in tv, have found that commercials can be created and placed for less than 15%, thus providing impetus for reduced commissions, which really amounts to a fee.

"As advertisers have demanded more services, a fee structure had to be devised. We've been working with fee structures for major clients since 1960, and experience has shown us that this system adds stability and professionalism to the relationship."

Edward Eskandarian, president, Humphrey Browning MacDougall, Boston, stressed relevance: "As agency costs continue to rise, we must charge clients based on the amount of effort required, rather than the amount of media dollars spent."

Robert L. Flink, president, Grant/Jacoby, Chicago, who related the fee trend to current economic conditions, said he believes that fees should prevail but won't. "The problem with 15%," he said, "is that compensation is either too little or too much, completely related to media rather than the creative solution."

George H. Gruenwald, chief creative officer, Campbell-Mithun, Minneapolis, predicted agency services will expand, increasing use of fees. "We have added special services in programing, direct marketing, public relations, sales promotion, food service institutional, multimedia presentations and production of broadcast stimulus materials for audience research," he said. "And more's to come."

Others on the fee bandwagon: R. Joseph McIntyre, chairman and president, Sieber & McIntyre, Chicago: "It's just good business. The commission system is 1880-style."

Bruce Crawford, president, BBDO International, New York: "Fees allow agencies to earn reasonable profits on all clients, rather than very high profits from some clients and very low profits on others."

Irwin Gerson, president, William Douglas McAdams Inc., New York: "The fee trend results from increased agency costs and improved cost accounting. Also, some clients are more comfortable with fees, as they can understand precisely what they pay for."

Richard S. Seclow, president, Geer, DuBois, New York: "Advertisers are becoming more involved in agency profits. They are concerned that agencies have (1) large cash flows and (2) higher return on investment than advertisers."

John H. Newhall, chairman and ceo, Aitkin-Kynett Co., Philadelphia: "With commissions, agencies can't earn a fair profit on smaller or more complex accounts."

But the proponents of fees are in the minority, AA's survey indicated. The majority, seeing 15% prevailing in the forseeable future, accepted fees only for small or special accounts or as a supplement when needed.

Carl Spielvogel, chairman and ceo, Backer & Spielvogel, New York, summed it up: "The commission system is still the fairest. It has worked for years and continues."

Of the 29 agency chiefs surveyed, only five reported that they had switched to fees on some accounts in 1982-1983. One of these, Clarence M. Thompson Jr., ceo, Colle & McVoy, Minneapolis, concluded: "We have found a receptive attitude to fees when we can prove, through our cost accounting system, that the agency is not making a profit."

At Eisaman, Johns & Laws, which made "no significant changes," commission-oriented Mr. Laws added this to the profit picture: "We try for an operating profit of 15% to 20% of gross income—before profit sharing, taxes, investments to increase our capability and stability, or other discretionary expenditures. The client who doesn't meet our goal must (1) grow, (2) pay fees over and above the norm, (3) accept less service or (4) no service. Any agency that believes otherwise cannot survive."

The heart of the question, of course, is what system best permits the agency to deliver a good product at a fair profit. For achieving that, Mr. Bowen at Benton & Bowles had this final comment: "Agencies shouldn't be bashful about asking for decent profits. Clients want good profits to reward their shareholders and to motivate their people. Heaven knows, agencies have the same desires." ■

100 Leaders parry recession with heavy spending

Copyright ©1983 by Advertising Age. Quotation or reproduction in whole or in part without written permission is expressly prohibited.

By Marion L. Elmquist

The 100 top national advertisers of 1982 decided to spend their way out of the recession by increasing ad expenditures by 15.2%. Total spending by the leaders for 1982 was $17.1 billion, compared with $14.8 billion in 1981. Sales, however, were off 0.9%, dropping to $765.3 billion.

Some of the heaviest spending came from the leisure and entertainment area populated by Coca-Cola Co.'s Columbia Pictures, Gulf & Western Industries with its Paramount Pictures, MCA Inc., Mattel Inc., 20th Century-Fox Film Corp. and Warner Communications.

Warner Communications, for example, moved into the 25th position this year from No. 37 last year. The company raised its ad spending 46% to $232.2 million in 1982 from $159 million the year earlier. Much of Warner's spending was to support its troubled Atari division. In 1982, Atari spent $74 million in measured advertising media and in the first quarter of 1983 alone, it spent $14.5 million. Warner also puts advertising support behind its movies, television programing, record and music business and cable programing projects.

Gulf & Western had a 30% rise in spending, fueled by the biggest advertiser among its units, Paramount Pictures Corp. Another entertainment unit, Simon & Schuster, also added to the total ad budget.

Advertisers in other product categories—food, chemicals and toiletries, for instance—remained fairly even. But one among their members, Campbell Soup Co., emerged as a big spender: The food products company boosted advertising by 71% to $121 million from $70.8 million in 1981. That moved it to a rank of 52 from 74 the previous year. The spending increase came about as a result of the continued aggressive stance Campbell president R. Gordon McGovern has taken since he took over as president-chief executive officer in 1980. Included in Mr. McGovern's new program are acquisitions, new products and line expansions.

One story that hasn't changed in the leaders compilations is Procter & Gamble's dominance of the No. 1 ranking, which it has held since 1964. (See chart on Page 160 tracing P&G spending over the last 10 years.) Sears, Roebuck & Co. has continued to narrow the gap between the No. 1 and No. 2 positions and, if Advertising Age included local retail spending in its tabulations, Sears would surely wrest the No. 1 spot from P&G.

Procter & Gamble raised its spending by a modest 8% to $726.1 million in 1982, but at that rate of annual increase, it will take only four years—until 1986 (or the 1987 issue of 100 Leading National Advertisers)—until P&G passes the $1 billion ad spending mark.

Some of the most heavily supported products in P&G's domain were 15 laundry soap products backed by $130 million in measured media, seven bar soaps that received $56 million, five dishwashing products that got $50 million, paper products that received $75 million and personal care products that got $140 million.

As usual, there was jockeying for position in the top 10 list. General Motors Corp., fueled by heavy rebate spending, moved from No. 5 to No. 3. R.J. Reynolds Industries took the No. 4 spot, a significant jump from last year's No. 8. One reason RJR rose in ranking is because of its acquisition of Heublein last year. Ad spending for Heublein products contributed to RJR's total spending. Philip Morris Inc. dropped one notch, from No. 4 to No. 5, and General Foods Corp., which was No. 3 last year, is now No. 6. American Telephone & Telegraph Co. moved to No. 7 from No. 9;

AMR Corp., Dallas, formed October, 1982, as the holding company of American Airlines and its subsidiaries, is the nation's 87th largest advertiser with expenditures of $61.6 million in 1982, a 19.6% increase over the previous year.

The company's first annual earnings report reflected the devastating effects of fare slashing that has characterized the super-competitive, deregulated airline industry. Sales rose slightly from 1981 to 1982, from $4.11 billion to $4.18 billion, but net earnings plunged into the red. The company reported earnings of $47.4 million in 1981, but that fell to a net loss of $19.6 million in 1982.

The airline subsidiary took steps last month to reverse the decline by announcing it would cut to 9% from 10% the commission it pays to retail travel agents on airline tickets and eliminate the 3% commission it pays to "in-plant" agents that serve the corporate account on premise. The measure, said the airline, would save more than $20 million annually in commissions.

American, however, met with resistance from other airlines in cutting commissions by 10% across the board and dropped the plan, although it retained its intent to eliminate all commissions to "in-plant" agencies. The savings likely to result from this abbreviated measure is not known.

In 1982, at least 72% of the airline's revenues were derived from scheduled coach service and 9.8% came from scheduled first-class travel.

The airline carried 27.7 million revenue passengers in 1982, compared to the previous year's 24.7 million for a passenger load factor of 63.3% in 1982, compared to 51.4% in 1981. But about 78% of American's passengers used a discount fare in 1982, up from 70% in 1981 and 60% in 1980.

During the year, American moved almost all of its measured advertising into television—$23 million out of a total $24.5 million. It spent some 22% of its budget in magazines the previous year.

American began to climb out of its nosedive in the first quarter of 1983, when it ran up losses of only $28.1 million on revenues of $1.04 billion, compared to the previous year's first-quarter loss of $41.6 million on revenues of $956.9 million.

While continuing to expand in the wake of Braniff International's bankruptcy, American launched a program to increase productivity, to institute effective cost controls and to intensify its marketing effort.

American's expansion in 1982 spanned the globe. A Kansas City-Dallas/Fort Worth (DFW) route was added as was a Chicago-Denver route. And American negotiated an aircraft interchange with Alaska Airlines to link Houston and DFW with Anchorage and Fairbanks.

Following Braniff's demise in May, 1982, American won temporary authority to fly the DFW-London Gatwick route, which was subsequently awarded to American in a five-year certificate. American also began flights to Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo from DFW, began DFW-Wichita, Kan., service, added a second daily nonstop 747 flight between DFW and Honolulu and started daily service between San Francisco and Honolulu.

American's International Flagship Service was unveiled in October with what American described as "superior cuisine, outstanding wines and sleeperette seats" on the DFW to London and Rio routes flown with DC-10-30 aircraft. Business class service was introduced on international flights and was extended to some transcontinental flights in early 1983.

Earlier, American had canceled its plans to acquire a fleet of Boeing 757 aircraft and it had extended delivery schedules for 30 Boeing 767 aircraft on order. It placed into service its first three 767 aircraft between New York and San Francisco in December, 1982. In early 1983, American ordered 20 twin-jet McDonnell Douglas Super 80 aircraft.

In January, 1983, American moved from its temporary headquarters in Grand Prairie, Tex., into new corporate headquarters in the complex with its flight academy, learning center and southern reservations center, all at DFW Airport.

Promotionally, American joined in the 1982 fare discounting melee led by Braniff with its impromptu two-for-one sales to raise quick cash. Although Braniff departed from the competitive scene in May, discount fares remained the dominant tool throughout 1982. The damage done to airline profits during that time led American, with others, to raise fares gradually, and in April of this year American adopted a simplified mileage-based fare structure along with Delta Air Lines and Eastern Air Lines.

The U.S. Department of Justice filed a civil suit against American Airlines and its president Robert Crandall, alleging that he had tried to monopolize airline routes by fixing prices with Braniff. The basis of the suit was a Feb. 1, 1982, telephone conversation Mr. Crandall had with Howard Putnam, Braniff chairman. The suit seeks to remove Mr. Crandall from office for two years, but he has urged the court to throw out the suit because no actual price-fixing resulted from the conversation with Mr. Putnam.

At the same time the civil action was filed, the Justice Department announced termination of a federal grand jury investigation into charges that American Airlines had used "dirty tricks" to hasten the demise of Braniff International. No criminal charges were filed at the end of the investigation.

On April 17, 1983, American en-

American Brands, New York, the 78th largest national advertiser, spent an estimated $72.3 million on advertising in 1982, a 12% decrease from the previous year.

The company's net sales dropped for the second consecutive year, slipping slightly to $6.5 billion. The decline can be attributed to decreased sales in international tobacco products, food products, hardware and specialty business subsidiaries.

American Brands' net income also declined in 1982, dropping 1% to $381.2 million from the record setting $386.1 million in 1981.

Sales of the tobacco products in domestic markets increased 2.6% to $1.2 billion. Sales, however, of the tobacco products worldwide dropped 1% to $2.97 billion. Despite these less than dramatic results, the tobacco division performed best among divisions at American Brands.

The domestic tobacco division of American Brands—American Tobacco Co. and American Cigar—rolled out the new Lucky Strike low-tar filters backed by about $4.3 million in measured advertising, some $2.7 million going to outdoor and $1.6 million to magazines. Another $87,300 was spent in outdoor only for filter 100s. The rollout included heavy sponsorship of sporting events, funds not included in measured spending.

Carlton continued its reign as king of the ultralow-tar filter cigarets with a 10% share of market in value. Measured media spending for the panoply of Carlton cigarets was $23.3 million. Of that total, the big bucks went into multiproduct advertising ($11.5 million), Carlton filters ($10 million), Carlton 120s filters ($342,500), and Carlton filter kings regular and menthol ($148,600).

Tareyton and Tareyton Lights rank as the leading charcoal filter brands. Tareyton Lights drew $2 million in measured ad support. The company's other low-tar cigarets are Pall Mall Lights, drawing $7.8 million in ad spending for Light 100s ($7.4 million), Light 100s menthol ($144,400) and filters ($228,700).

Nonfilter cigarets are on the wane, but American Brands' leading contender, Pall Mall Kings, unadvertised in major media, continued to rank as the fifth best-selling cigaret in the U.S., despite sales declines affected by a nationwide increase of 34% in cigaret prices due in part to the doubling of the federal excise tax.

In the smokeless tobacco category, sales were down for Half and Half, Paladin black cherry and Bourbon Blend, as well as American Cigar's brands—Sail, Flying Dutchman, Clan and Blue Boar. The company also markets Antonio y Cleopatra, Roi-Tan and La Corona cigars. The company had $501,200 in measured spending on Antonio y Cleopatra cigar advertising, $122,400 on Flying Dutchman tobacco, and $11,200 on Sail.

Internationally, American Brands' tobacco business is based almost exclusively in U.K.-based Gallaher Ltd., which had record sales (up 14%) and operating income (up 2%) compared to 1981.

While the industry suffered an 8% drop in sales in the U.K., Gallaher grabbed greater market share buttressed by Benson & Hedges special filter, the leading U.K. brand with 15% of total share of market in value. All B&H categories give Gallaher a 30% share of market.

Gallaher's new cigaret, Berkeley extra mild king, made gains in market share, said the company, which also launched two product extensions in Southeast England—Berkeley luxury length and Benson & Hedges longer length.

Gallaher has a hammerlock on the U.K. cigar market. In 1982, it increased its share to 46%, with gains made by its Hamlet and Benson & Hedges small cigar lines. American Brand's Condor continued as the country's top-selling pipe tobacco. In the high-price cigaret segment, Old Holdborn remained the second biggest seller.

American Brands' distilled beverages division had another record year, as operating income increased 7% to $32.6 million on sales of $227.3 million, an 8% improvement over the previous year.

The company's big brand, Jim Beam, continued to rank as the world's top bourbon. In 1982, it gained in both market share and dollar volume. The company spent $2.8 million to advertise Jim Beam, allocating $2.3 million in magazines and $530,000 outdoor. American Brands invested an additional $61,300 in magazine advertising for its Jim Beam Sweepstakes. Beam's other whiskies, Beam's Black Label and Beam's choice bourbon, had sales gains in 1982 but received no measured media support. The company's cordials suffered sales declines that were offset with gains Beam's 8-Star blended whisky and Dark Eyes vodka. The company invested $44,300 on Dark Eyes advertising.

Beam Import Co. substantially increased the distribution of Kamora Imported Coffee Liqueur Co. (a 1981 acquisition), and spent $190,100 promoting Kamora in major media.

The company added the Margarita tequila cocktail, marketing rights for Cheverny brandy and Beam Import became the exclusive importer of Aalborg Akvavit.

Internationally, the Beam business was brisk, as sales in New Zealand and Australia increased substantially. Sales also were aided by distribution rights to the U.S. Armed Forces stationed throughout the globe.

Early in 1982, American Brands sold its Duffy-Mott fruit juice subsidiary to Cadbury Schweppes for nearly $100 million.

Despite a 16% sales drop in the remaining food operations at American Brands, Sunshine Biscuits had a record year. Last August, Sunshine Biscuits shifted its advertising account from Marsteller Inc. to a Della Femina, Travisano & Partners subsidiary, Sherwood & Schneider. The company invested $651,300 in the major media to promote the Sunshine cookies and crackers. Hydrox cookies received $327,900. New products in the division included Chocolate Cremers, Peanut Butter Cremers and cinnamon graham cookies.

The company's snack division retained its leadership position on the West Coast. In 1981, the company added no-salt-added potato chips to its increasingly popular Chipples chips, introduced in 1981.

Increased competition in the hand lotion market prompted a drop in operating income of 26% at its Jergens Co. unit. Jergens' industrial skin cleanser business also was adversely affected by the drop in industrial employment. Jergens reported successes with Jergens Aloe & Lanolin lotion (out nationally in late 1981) and Fiesta deodorant soap. It spent $261,400 in major media to promote the Aloe & Lanolin lotion and $305,300 on Fiesta soap.

New product introductions have panned out well for Jergens. According to the company, 42% of the 1982 Jergens' sales can be attributed to new products introduced over the past five years. In 1982, Jergens spent a measured $170,700 in media testing Squeak!, a shampoo/conditioner. For its classic Jergens' lotions, advertising expenditures totaled $3.1 million for Jergens lotion; $410,400 for Jergens liquid soap, and $235,500 for Jergens lotion soap. With an increased emphasis on its bar soap line, the company invested $1.1 million on its Gentle Touch soap campaign.

For its Gee Your Hair Smells Terrific shampoo and conditioner, a product that has had less than glistening sales, the company spent $103,000 in advertising.

The Titleist division of Acushnet Co. invested nearly $3 million in advertising Acushnet golf balls and $777,800 for golf clubs.

American Brands, declaring its intent to expand through acquisition, last year bought the Pinkerton Co. security and investigative service for $160 million. Pinkerton had a modest ad budget in 1982 of $94,100 in measured media.

A gardening magazine—if it's the largest gardening magazine—is a great place to cultivate sales for all kinds of advertisers:

Sellers of garden products and outdoor power equipment, of course.

But automotive companies, too: They know that over half of our subscribers own pickups.

Kitchen-appliance manufacturers: They see cooking and baking from scratch in 97% of our subscriber households.

And power-tool or home-energy advertisers—who know all about our readers' reliance on a self-reliant lifestyle.

Ask Robot-Coupe. Or Stihl. Or Sears. Then ask yourself: Shouldn't you be sharing in the harvest?

American Broadcasting Cos., New York, the 100th largest national advertiser, increased its advertising budget 7.2% to an estimated $42.8 million in 1982.

The ABC Television Network was ABC's leading corporate spender, increasing its measured media budget 15% to $13.9 million from $12 million in 1981.

All but $470,000 went to magazines, as usual. The increase in tv network spending reversed a trend set last year, when ABC-TV cut advertising spending almost 25%.

The next biggest ad spender was WABC radio, the ABC-owned-and-operated station in New York, which spent $1.1 million in spot tv, a dramatic increase from the 1981 budget of $18,500 in magazines exclusively.

In 1982, ABC reported record revenues of $2.6 billion for 1982, a 9% increase from 1981 revenues of $2.4 billion. After being flat in 1981, net earnings in 1982 increased 9.3% to $160 million from $146 million.

The company reported that while revenues reached record levels in the tv network and owned tv stations divisions, increased competition for advertising revenues in radio and publishing, combined with advertiser resistance to make dollar commitments to new ventures in video technologies and network radio, prevented net earning from reaching even higher levels.

The ABC Television Network division showed earnings increases despite the disruptive effect of the National Football League players' strike and higher costs for entertainment and news programing.

The ABC Owned Television Stations division increased revenues for the third consecutive year and posted the first earnings gains for the division in two years.

ABC Publishing experienced a 7% decline in revenues in 1982, compared with 1981, but earnings before taxes rose to $23.9 million from $4.3 million.

ABC Video Enterprises increased revenues 17.5% in 1982, but losses before taxes increased to $32.3 million, compared with $7.6 million in 1981. The losses were attributed to ABC's three advertiser-supported cable networks' failure to attract sufficient ad support, the development of the RSVP pay-television sports service and the preparations for startup of TeleFirst, a national over-the-air program distribution service that changed its name this year from the Home View Network.

1982, showed a modest combined gross profit but continued to operate at a loss as a result of administrative and development costs, the company said.

After falling behind CBS in the fall 1982 ratings, ABC Television Network closed the gap mightily in the second half of the broadcast year to finish only one-half rating point behind CBS in prime time yearly averages ended April, 1983. The ABC-TV comeback was sparked primarily by the tremendous ratings successes of two miniseries, "The Winds of War" and "The Thorn Birds."

In the early-morning daypart, ABC's "Good Morning, America" dominated its network competition for the third year in a row.

In daytime programing, ABC continued its dominance of the three networks, a position it has held since 1977. The soap operas "All My Children," "General Hospital" and "One Life to Live" remained the highest rated among women viewers 18 to 49. The network added a new soap, "Loving," to the lineup this year.

ABC-TV Network also had success with made-for-tv movies, including "Grace Kelly," "Malibu" and "Charles and Diana: A Royal Love Story," among others.

While broadcasts of theatrical films included blockbusters such as "Kramer vs. Kramer," "Coal Miner's Daughter," "The Electric Horseman" and "Star Trek—The Motion Picture," the ratings strength and cost efficiency of the made-for-tv movies has led ABC-TV to begin purchasing fewer theatrical titles for next season.

ABC News launched two new programs, "World News This Morning" and "The Last Word," which has been canceled. "World News Tonight" employed its three-anchor format, which was interrupted this year when anchor Frank Reynolds died from viral hepatitis and cancer.

"Nightline," the late-night interview program with Ted Koppel, continued to perform well, although stations carrying the show have never approached NBC's number of stations for "The Tonight Show with Johnny Carson," its principal rival.

In sports, "ABC's Wide World of Sports" remained durable after 21 years on the air, registering its highest-rated Saturday and Sunday editions in 1982. NCAA college football continued to play on ABC. ABC Sports also concluded its first season of U.S. Football League broadcasts.

The ABC Owned Television Stations division was the most profitable station group in the country in 1982. KABC-TV retained its status as the ratings leader in Los Angeles. WXYZ-TV in Detroit remained the ratings leader in the market, while expanding its local news programing and producing the top-rated local morning program, "Kelly & Company." KGO-TV remained the top-ranked news programing in San Francisco.

ABC Radio launched two new networks and a national talk programing service, while closing down Superadio. The ABC Directions and ABC Rock Networks were launched in early 1982, and ABC Talkradio was introduced in May, 1982. ABC Radio Networks is converting to digital satellite transmission in a rollout plan that will be completed by 1984.

The ABC Owned Radio Stations division changed two stations, WABC-AM in New York and KGO-FM in San Francisco, to talk formats.

The division also acquired Watermark, a radio program producer and supplier, in 1982.

In 1982, ABC Video Enterprises, through joint ventures, launched two new advertiser-supported cable programing services, "Daytime" and Satellite News Channel. Recently, however, ABC announced that "Daytime" and the ARTS cultural service will be folded into an expanded joint venture with Viacom and its Cable Health Network. The new entity is to be called Hearst/ABC-Viacom Entertainment Services (HAVES).

In 1982, ABC Video Enterprises also began startup tests of the Home View Network, now called TeleFirst. The service, which is expected to go into test market in Chicago in January, 1984, will use broadcast signals to send scrambled signals of current theatrical films and other unspecified programing to subscribers equipped with home videocassette recorders.

ABC Video also entered a joint venture with ESPN for a pay-cable sports service, RSVP. The service staged its first event in 1983, the dual heavyweight championship boxing matches in May.

ABC Video in 1982 also formed a joint venture with Cox Communications to explore the opportunities in pay-per-view entertainment and information programing, including videogames, videotex and transactional services.

ABC Publishing reached record profits in 1982, with Chilton Co., a trade magazine publishing house, being its biggest revenue generator. Los Angeles magazine in 1982 achieved record revenues for a city magazine.

ABC Motion Pictures' "Young Doctors in Love," the unit's first theatrical release, had box office gross revenues of about $30 million.

In top-level personnel moves, Frederick Pierce was promoted to president and chief operating officer at ABC Inc. from executive vp. Mr. Pierce replaced Elton Rule, who became vice-chairman.

Anthony Thomopoulos was moved from president at ABC Entertainment to president at ABC Broadcast Group, a new position. Lew Erlicht, who had headed prime time programing at ABC Entertainment, was promoted to president of the division.

*AA estimate

American Cyanamid Co., Wayne, N.J., the 47th largest advertiser in the U.S., cut its ad spending 3% in 1982 to an estimated $133 million.

Worldwide sales of the company and its subsidiaries decreased 5.4% to $3.45 billion in 1982. Net earnings decreased 33% to $132.1 million after having increased 23.8% to $197 million in 1981.

The earnings decline was attributed in part to pretax foreign currency exchange losses of $72 million. In 1981, foreign currency exchange losses were tabbed at $52.2 million.

Although high interest rates, reduced industrial activity and a farm depression affected the agricultural, chemical, consumer products and Formica brand products groups of Cyanamid, the medical group fared well, despite the rising value of the dollar.

Worldwide sales of $500 million for the consumer products group were down from $519 million in 1981. This represents 14% of the total company sales, a percentage that has remained steady for the past five years. Earnings from consumer operations were $16 million, down from $34 million last year.

In the U.S., sales of Shulton toiletries increased, helped along by the successful launch of Lady's Choice, a new solid antiperspirant. Cyanamid spent $5.7 million in media support on this new product; of that total $5.3 million was spent on network tv advertising.

The men's deodorant and antiperspirant business showed good sales and market share gains. As Old Spice stick deodorant continued to grow, Old Spice solid antiperspirant was introduced successfully.

Media spending for Old Spice stick deodorant was $4.3 million, principally on network tv. Another $2.5 million was invested in network and spot tv for Old Spice solid.

Pine-Sol liquid cleaner, the market leader, continued to experience increased sales. The company spent $6.4 million on Pine-Sol, allocating the budgets to network tv and spot tv.

In the fragrance segment, Old Spice maintained its No. 1 position. The company spent $7.7 million in media advertising to support the brand. Blue Stratos aftershave/cologne showed a modest year-to-year market share increase. Its $2.2 million budget included $1.4 million on network tv and the rest in magazines and spot tv.

While some of these products may have fared decently in the economic climate, the recession had a negative effect on the sales of prestige fragrances in the U.S. However, L'Air du Temps, Pierre Cardin and Grey Flannel brands managed to maintain their positions among the top 10 fragrances in their respective categories. Major media spending was as follows: $1.8 million for L'Air du Temps and $1.2 million for Pierre Cardin Cologne for Men, all in spot tv. Media spending for Cie perfume totaled $1.8 million in 1982.

Two new fragrances, Niki de Saint Phalle and Nina Ricci's Fleur de Fleurs, were successfully introduced by the Jacqueline Cochran subsidiary in 1982. Early in 1983 Cyanamid acquired the Swiss skincare line, La Prairie, to complement the prestige fragrance business.

The medical group was the largest contributor to profits in the company in 1982. Sales increased to $884 million, or 26% of the corporate total. Earnings increased to $98 million, or 42% of total operating earnings, up from $88 million in 1981.

Cyanamid's medical business consists of both prescription and nonprescription pharmaceutical products and hospital products. These products are marketed in the U.S. by the Lederle Laboratories division. The growth rate for pharmaceutical sales was the second highest among all major drug companies both in the U.S. and Europe.

The leading performer among the medical group was piperacillin, a new semisynthetic penicillin that was successfully launched in eight markets, including the U.S., Canada, Italy, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom. By the end of 1982, piperacillin had reached the second highest sales level ever recorded in the U.S. for an antibiotic in its introductory year.

A nonsteroid anti-inflammatory, Cinopal fenbufen, now awaiting the marketing go-ahead from the Food & Drug Administration, showed good sales growth in overseas markets in 1982, the company said.

Sales of Davis & Geck products, the surgical specialties area of the company, increased in 1982, aided by higher sales of Dexon absorbable sutures and the successful introduction in both the U.S. and Canada of Appose disposable skin stapler.

In the field of biotechnology, Lederle Laboratories entered into an agreement with Molecular Genetics in 1982 to work to produce a vaccine to immunize people against the viruses that cause some cold sores and genital herpes. Under the agreement, Lederle would produce and market the vaccine, using genetic-engineering technology developed by Molecular Genetics.

Worldwide sales of vitamins increased substantially, with Centrum multivitamins showing significant gains in this country. Centrum Jr., Lederle's first children's chewable vitamin, was introduced successfully last year.

Centrum has become a market leader in only four years, aided by its promotional tie-in with the 1980 Olympics, as well as substantial tv advertising.

In 1982 Cyanamid spent $9.3 million advertising Centrum vitamin and mineral tablets, making it the company's most heavily advertised product. Ad spending included $8.5 million on network tv and the rest on spot tv. This compares with $6.9 million spent in 1981.

Media spending for Stresstabs 600 vitamins increased to $3.9 million in 1982, up from $2.9 million in 1981. Of that total, $1.7 million was spent on magazines, $2.1 million on network tv and the rest on spot tv.

Cyanamid's agricultural group experienced declining sales and operating earnings in 1982, primarily because of depressed conditions in key market areas. Sales of $731 million—21% of total corporate sales—were down from $844 million, or 23% of total sales, in 1981. Operating earnings were down substantially, from $120 million in 1981 to $61 million in 1982.

The U.S. phosphate and nitrogen fertilizer industry had a disastrous year as a result of reduced demand, high inventories and overcapacity. These factors have combined to drive prices down to their lowest level in many years. In addition, the higher value of the dollar depressed export sales.

One product, Avotan growth promoter, increased its market share in Italy, France and Germany and maintained its leadership position in the European hog and poultry markets.

Maxforce insecticide roach control system was introduced for professional pest control in the U.S. in January, 1983. Cyanamid is also seeking registration for the use of Pay-Off insecticide on coffee plants, fruits and vegetables following its successful introduction to cotton growers worldwide.

Following the company's strategy to build on the basic strengths of the business by introducing new products in the animal industry area, Cyanamid introduced a patented gel formulation of Tramisol levamisole to expand the use of this major deworming product.

As in the agricultural products group, sales in Cyanamid's chemical group were down, declining to $967 million in 1982, or 28% of total sales for the company. Earnings dropped to $28 million in 1982. Last year, the group had sales of $1.1 billion and earnings of $78 million.

The economic climate influenced virtually every manufacturing and resource recovery industry serviced by the chemical division. Only the fibers business showed significant gains in 1982. This performance was based on the growing popularity of Creslan acrylic fiber in the hosiery market, coupled with a more energy-efficient manufacturing process.

Sales of the Formica brand products group also showed a decline, dropping to $372 million in 1982 from $412 million in the previous year. Earnings were $16 million, down from $33 million in 1981. The Formica group contributed 11% to Cyanamid's total sales for the last two years.

American Express Co., New York, the 63rd largest national advertiser, increased its advertising expenditures 25.5% in 1982 to $95.5 million from $76 million in 1981.

Sales at the financial and travel-related services company rose 11% to $8.1 billion in 1982. Earnings also increased 11% to $581 million. This upward trend is one that American Express has realized every year for the last 35 years. And the company is going for No. 36 if the first six months of 1983 are any indication: Reported earnings were $356 million vs. $262 million in 1982, a 36% increase. Sales for the six-month period increased to $4.8 billion from $3.7 billion in 1982.

Last August, American Express was the first financial services company added to the companies that make up the Dow Jones Industrial Average. The company saw this as confirming its belief that diverse financial services in this country will be one of the world's largest growth industries.

The American Express Co. comprises four business segments: American Express Travel Related Services Co., Fireman's Fund Insurance Cos., Shearson/American Express (brokerage and investment services) and American Express International Banking Corp. (AEIBC).

Earlier this year, the company completed the acquisition of several non-U.S. banking subsidiaries of the Trade Development Bank Holding S.A., which caters to an affluent market in Europe and Latin America. Earnings from international banking services rose from $12.1 millon to $31.8 million, a 163% increase over the first quarter of 1982.

The company also announced in July, 1983, the acquisition of Investors Diversified Services. IDS is a marketer of mutual funds and insurance. But one month later, plans for the acquisition were abandoned. This move is one of the first major turnarounds in Amex's continuing solidification of its position as a major financial conglomerate.

Amex's advertising spending in 1982 for network and spot tv was $39.5 million, a 13% increase over $35 million in 1981. More than half—$21.7 million—was used in promoting the company's credit card service. Karl Malden continued to commiserate with beleaguered travelers with the familiar admonition, "Don't leave home without it." Another continuing theme, "Do you know me?" extolled the card's virtues. Spokespeople (some of whose only apparent claim to fame is their name embossed on the green card) have ranged from sports figures (Tom Landry) to singers (Roger Miller) to prima ballerinas (Cynthia Gregory). Commercials portraying hotel personnel thrown into a frenzy of preparation for a soon-to-arrive card-carrying guest also underlined the clout the corporate Amex card bestows. There are currently 16 million American Express cards in use—15% more than in 1982.

The "Do you know me?" theme was used in radio late last year when American Express began a new campaign, which started in Southern California. The campaign features only restaurateurs in 30-second spots and is designed to mak customers more aware of restaurants that accept the American Express card. Shearson/American Express radio spots describe the brokerage's relationship with "the serious investor" as one of "minds over money." Spending for spot radio in 1982 was $2.9 million. This is double the $1.4 million the company spent in 1981.

One flaw that mars Amex's glowing financial complexion is its Warner Amex cable television joint venture with Warner Communications. Warner Amex Cable Communications (WACC), the sixth-largest cable company in the U.S., lost a reported $47 million in 1982. Results so far in 1983 indicate the situation hasn't cleared up yet: WACC continues to lose money because of "cost overruns and construction" problems as it builds more cable systems in metropolitan areas.

Former U.S. Secretary of Transportation Drew Lewis became chief executive officer of the cable tv operation Feb. 1, 1983. His No. 1 priority will be to restructure the company. Mr. Lewis also oversees Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Co. (WASEC), although the programing arm will continue to operate as a separate company.

MTV:Music Television, one of the basic services offered by WASEC, grew in 1982 to 8.8 million subscribers from 2.2 million in 1981. This year, it became the first basic cable service to advertise on network tv (AA, July 11). Such rock biggies as David Bowie and Pat Benatar offered their services gratis to tout MTV in the tv campaign that began July 14 and ran for two weeks.

In addition to Mr. Lewis, there were several other changes in American Express' management profile. Sanford I. Weill, chairman of Shearson/American Express, was elected president of the parent company. He was succeeded by Louis V. Gerstner Jr., who continues to serve as chairman and ceo of American Express Travel Related Services. Peter A. Cohen, formerly vice-chairman and chief operating officer of Shearson/American Express is its new ceo and president. Edwin F. Cutler was elected chairman and ceo and vice-chairman and a director of American Express.

American Home Products Corp., New York, the 10th largest national advertiser, increased its advertising 14.1% in 1982 to $325.4 million from the previous year as the company recorded its 30th consecutive year of increased sales and earnings.

Sales at AHP totaled $4.58 billion, an increase of 10.9%, and earnings hit $560.1 million, up 12.6% over the previous year.

The performance carried into the first and second quarters of the new fiscal year. Citing growth in heart drugs, birth control pills and tranquilizers, AHP reported for the second quarter a 13.4% increase in net income to $142.9 million, and a 7.3% increase in sales to $1.17 billion over the year-earlier period. Gains also were reported in food products, household products and housewares.

The largest division at AHP, prescription drugs and medical supplies, accounted for 47% of total sales and 62% of pretax earnings, including results of Sherwood Medical Group, acquired from Brunswick Corp. for $425 million in March, 1982.

In 1982, the ethical drug divisions introduced to the market Wytensin, an anti-hypertensive drug; Nordette, an oral contraceptive, and Aygestin, a hormone treatment. In April, 1983, the Food & Drug Administration approved Ives Laboratories' Cerubidine for use in pediatric leukemia care, and Ayerst Laboratories' Inderal LA for use in controlling high blood pressure, chest pain and migraine headache.

AHP's food segment, consisting of E.J. Brach & Sons and American Home Foods divisions, in which Chef Boy-Ar-Dee is the big advertised brand, accounted for 17.8% of total sales with $817 million for the year.

Chef Boy-Ar-Dee, which received $16.4 million in measured media spending—virtually all in network and spot tv and magazines—introduced Cosmic Kids, character-shaped macaroni in a chicken-flavored pasta and sauce. Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Soup Di Pasta joined Condensed Italian Starter sauce, Portofino Northern Italian style spaghetti sauce and Luck's Country Style soups in test market.

Gulden's mustard, which introduced a squeeze bottle, had measured ad spending of $1.3 million, an increase of 18% from the previous year.

In household products/housewares, which posted $1.03 billion or 22% of total sales, Boyle-Midway introduced Woolite Gentle Cycle Powder ($3 million campaign by Cunningham & Walsh), new Black Flag and Wizard products, Easy-Off mildew stain remover ($1 million) and Sani-Flush Tank II bowl cleaner. Ekco cut its ad budget to $760,000, down from $1.9 million in 1981.

Package medicine sales totaled $595 million. Whitehall Laboratories' Aspirin-Free Arthritis Pain Formula Anacin was introduced with actor Robert Young, who also is spokesman for Arthritis Pain Formula with aspirin. The products had a reported combined ad budget of $6.3 million in 1982.

Dristan, No. 2 in the over-the-counter cough/cold remedy market with a 13% share (Richardson-Vick's Nyquil holds the lead at 14%), spent about $23 million in advertising. Dristan Ultra Colds Formula in tablet, capsule and nighttime liquid was introduced, backed by $2.6 million in measured media.

Anacin reportedly holds 12% to 13% of the $850 million analgesic market, behind Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol. More than $29 million was spent on various Anacin advertising campaigns last year, up $1.6 million from 1981.

Anacin franchise sales skyrocketed after the Tylenol cyanide poisoning scare last year, moving from a reported 15.2% of food store sales for analgesics to about 21.5% six weeks into the scare. AHP also increased measured advertising for nonaspirin Anacin 3 from about $6.7 million in 1981 to $26 million. It was also reportedly couponing heavily during the Tylenol scare.

To help advertise these products, AHP in 1982 made its third consecutive multiyear deal with NBC. The buy, however, attracted attention, as AHP committed $250 million over three years, rather than two, to NBC. Of that, $100 million is for nighttime advertising. The deal locked up a substantial part of the network's inventory.

In February, 1982, AHP gutted its inhouse agency, John F. Murray Advertising, moving an estimated $50 million in creative and media planning assignments to five other agencies. Murray retained spot and network tv buying.

In the shakeup, William Esty Co. received Whitehall Labs' Anacin account. Kornhauser & Calene took Trendar and Preparation H, which received $17.5 million in 1982. Rosenfeld, Sirowitz & Lawson got Maximum Strength Anacin and Oxipor. In November, 1982, RS&L resigned the Sleep-Eze, Freezone, Semicid contraceptive, Maximum Strength Anacin and Oxipor accounts, worth an estimated $5 million in advertising. The agency had reportedly worked on commissions of 9% and less.

Cunningham & Walsh picked up Boyle-Midway's Aerowax and Easy-Off window cleaner. In January, 1983, Y&R received Whitehall Labs' Maximum Strength Anacin, Anbesol antiseptic, Bronitin asthma relief, Sleep-Eze, Neet hair remover and Semicid contraceptive. Billings were put at $13.5 million. RS&L gave up nearly all the products. Neet, however, came from Kornhauser & Calene and Anbesol from Esty.

Hicks & Greist got the controversial Sani-Flush Tank II automatic bowl cleaner, reported to have a $16 million kickoff campaign. Procter & Gamble sued AHP over the product, alleging it infringed on P&G's patent for Brigade automatic toilet bowl cleaner.

In management changes, Judson St. John was named president of Ayerst Laboratories, W. Richard Kern became president of Ekco Housewares, Robert Miller president of Dupli-Color Products and Paul van Zuydam managing director of Prestige Group.

American Honda Motor Co., Gardena, Cal., the 64th largest national advertiser and the third-largest auto importer in the U.S., is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Honda Motor Co. Ltd., Tokyo.

The U.S. sales unit is estimated to have increased its total ad spending for calendar 1982 to $94.9 million, up 39% from $68.3 million in 1981.

The company, which markets Honda automobiles, motorcycles and a line of consumer power products, posted an 18% gain in worldwide sales for its fiscal 1983, with overseas sales accounting for 70% of the year's consolidated total. Autos accounted for 56% of sales, motorcycles for 24%, power products for 6% and parts and other revenues for the remaining 14%.

Net income was also up 10%, an increase reflecting the higher value of the U.S. dollar and increased profit margins on U.S. sales.

Honda cars continued to sell well in world markets, thanks in part to their fuel-efficient engines and the front-wheel-drive technology, which has been a feature on all its passenger car models since 1967. The company's last fiscal year recorded worldwide car sales of 1,115,000 units, up 7% over the previous year—the second straight year Honda auto sales have exceeded the million-unit level.

The U.S. accounted for 365,000 units in 1982, down from 370,705 units, a drop influenced by import quota restrictions placed on all Japanese auto manufacturers in 1980. Honda, which ranks as Japan's third largest unit producer of passenger cars, accounts for 16.5% of all imports into the U.S., with a 4.6% share of the total U.S. market.

Honda continued to use its "We make it simple" ad theme into its sixth model year, positioning its cars as more dependable and simple than its competition. But the simplicity theme was modified somewhat when the company introduced the sporty 1983 Prelude cars in April with the backing of a $5 million multimedia ad campaign. When it came to describing the restyled and re-engineered Prelude, Honda called it a "sports touring coupe" priced at about $10,000 and in this case the word "simple" simply did not apply.

Network tv represented the major expenditure in the company's support of its 1983 models, including the Prelude which was on the receiving end of an intensive prime time network and spot tv effort that ran from the first week in April through June. A 30-second spot aired on the networks and a 60-second version was used in the 20 top spot markets. The company also made heavy use of newspapers, magazines and spot radio.

Once again the popular Honda Accord led the company's sales in the U.S., selling 195,524 units, up from 172,557 in 1981. However, sales of the low end Civic line dipped to 132,469, down from 154,698 in 1981. Prelude sales also were off, down to 37,872 units in 1982, from 43,450 a year earlier.

Worldwide sales of Honda motorcycles during the past fiscal year rose 4% to 3,661,000 units, which accounted for 24% of the company's total sales. In the U.S., Honda boosted market share to 43.1%, up six points over a year earlier. Once again it led the field, followed by Yamaha (22.7%), Suzuki (14.7%), Kawasaki (13.2%) and Harley-Davidson (4.7%).

Honda's motorcycle gains took place despite a declining market. But company executives forecast improved sales for 1983, with an additional expansion of Honda's presence and domination of the motorcycle marketplace. Unit sales in North America accounted for 17% of total motorcycle unit sales for Honda outside Japan. At the same time, output at Honda's motorcycle plant in Marysville, O., continued to add to the company's production total, and in November the first U.S.-produced Accord rolled off the assembly line at the new auto plant in Marysville.

Honda introduced a variety of new models in 1982 and spent $29.2 million in measured media in the process on motorcycles and motorized bikes. The over-all ad budget for motorcycles is said to be the largest in the company's history. Some 76% of the media mix was in network and spot tv. Out of the $1.9 million spent on advertising motorized bikes in measured media, magazines grabbed 93% of this budget. The over-all campaign was set to the theme of "Follow the leader," now in its fourth year.

The gains recorded by Honda motorcycles were enhanced by booming sales in the three-wheel ATV (all terrain vehicle) market where Honda continues to hold a dominating 80% share of the U.S. market. Honda kicked off its 1983 motorcycle promotions with its second year of sponsorship of the Super Bowl game, as well as AFC and NFL championship games. The stepped up promotional effort for 1983 included heavy support for the new 1100cc vee-four, custom-styled V65 Magna.

This year the company also entered the vee-twin market with a custom-styled series of vee-twins, 500cc and 750cc displacement sizes, in what was characterized as the Shadow series. Another vee-four 750cc machine, a high performance bike called the Interceptor, got rave "Bike of the Year" reviews in many enthusiast magazines.

Power products, the third major group in Honda's worldwide operations, encompasses some 40 different products built around Honda's small high-efficiency engines. Currently receiving advertising support estimated at the $3.5 million level, specific power products have been singled out for emphasis in consumer magazines, a change from the omnibus approach used for the entire product line a year ago. Major expenditures are going to spot tv on behalf of Honda lawn mowers and the EM600 electric generator.

Honda's share of the U.S. lawn mower market is about 1%, but the company emphasizes it is not competing for the entire lawn mower market, just the high-price end.

American Motors Corp., Southfield, Mich., the 79th largest national advertiser, increased its advertising budget 3% to $72 million in 1981.

While AMC sold more vehicles in 1982 than in 1981, its net loss rose to $153.5 million from $136.6 million in 1981. Sales, however, increased 11.5% to $2.9 billion.

AMC continued the same pattern in the first half of 1983, posting a loss of $145 million compared with a year-earlier loss of $119.7 million. Sales rose 37% to $1.4 billion. Lower international sales, expenses in phasing out AMC's rear-drive cars and costs associated with launching a new line of Jeeps, a second Renault version and a new four-cylinder engine were cited by AMC as contributing to the mounting deficit.

Renault products and the Jeep line are expected to carry the ball for AMC in the future. Alliance, a French car built in America, was introduced in September of 1982 with a $20 million ad campaign—large for just one car. The heavy advertising expenditure for Alliance and Fuego, introduced the previous spring, was aimed at not only increasing awareness of the cars, but doing the same for Renault as a whole.

Yet AMC's ad budget wasn't thrown out of whack—expenditures for other lines were trimmed. The biggest change was a jump in network tv spending to more than $26 million from $10 million. Spot tv dropped some $4 million while print increased slightly.

Renault consolidated its control of AMC (46% stock ownership) and named Jose J. Dedeurwaerder president. Five Renault executives are on the board of directors.

As Renault products proved successful in 1982, AMC labels struggled to survive. AMC Spirit and Concord were discontinued in the spring of 1983 because of a nearly 50% drop in sales. Eagle slumped from 43,221 in 1981 to 35,206 sales in 1982. Sales of AMC's other 4wd units, Jeep CJ, Cherokee, Scrambler, Wagoneer and pickup, were up slightly from 63,275 vehicles. The XJ is to be introduced in the fall of 1983 with a doubled Jeep ad budget.

Renault brand sales in 1982 stood at 37,540, up 21% from 30,869 in 1981. Fuego had sales of 12,000, some 20% more than the expected, and Alliance sold 30,173 units in its debut quarter with projections of well over 100,000 in the 1983 model year.

Total AMC vehicle sales dropped 7% to 213,734 units in 1982 from 230,826 units in 1981. Automotive operation losses increased to $193.9 million in 1982, compared with $149.4 million in 1981. AM General, marketer of postal and military vehicles, turned the largest profit for AMC in 1982—a total of $40.4 million over 1981's $13.2 million.

Along with the 7% decline in auto sales in 1982, AMC dropped to a 2% share of the total domestic market in 1982 from a 2.2% share in 1981. Jeep sales increased slightly in 1982, but AMC's share of the 4wd market slumped to 13.2% in 1982 from 15.8% in 1981.

In the fall of 1981, AMC restructured brand management and reorganized strategies to better market the three distinct product lines for model 1982. Jeep advertising budget was doubled, and Renault concentrated on image awareness with the line, "Where great engineering lives in great design." AMC cars got a versatility pitch; "Eagle is two cars in one (2wd and 4wd)."

Detroit auto makers cut prices in an attempt to induce sales, and AMC joined in with dealer incentives and rebates covering almost all of its vehicles. There was a $750 rebate on Jeep Wagoneers, Cherokee and big trucks, and a 10% rebate on Renault 18i, AMC Eagles and Concords. Prices were also slashed on LeCar.

In December, AMC was forced by the Federal Trade Commission to use stronger language on warning stickers put on Jeeps. The new stickers emphasized the possibility of rollover of the high-center-of-gravity Jeeps in "sudden sharp turns and abrupt maneuvers."

AMC tried to steer away from further rebates and targeted old-car owners with the "American Motors old car retirement plan," which provided consumers with up to $500 on top of an old car's trade-in value. The 1977-78 models received a $300 turn-in rebate and older models were given $500. Print and tv ads used the theme, "Which is going to give out first, your car or your money?"

While special programs continued, AMC shifted focus onto building the image of Renault and preparing the market for the new Alliance. The sporty Fuego, introduced in April, was said to be "the key to straddling both the domestic and import markets." Fuego accounted for more than 25% of Renault's import sales, which were up 22%. Ads used the headline: "New. Racy. Fuego."

In surpassing its sales predictions for Fuego, AMC cut advertising for the sportster when it ran out of cars to sell. AMC "reintroduced" the Fuego in March, 1983, with commercials concentrating on the turbocharged version and linking it with Renault's Formula One race cars.

The Renault Alliance entered the market in the fall with the $20 million introductory advertising campaign. The Alliance, Kenosha, Wis.-built from the French R-9, was called the most successful new product launch in the history of AMC.

The company boosted its advertising budget 17% on its new Renault vehicles, with Alliance tv and print ads playing off "Now Renault bridges the gap between European excellence and affordability."

Alliance received a "car of the year" award from a car "buff" magazine and advertised it heavily. Alliance lifted the company's domestic retail sales 49% for the quarter compared with the same period in 1981. AMC also pledged a policy of no rebates and "aggressive" sticker pricing.

The Jeep arm of AMC received little advertising attention in the fall, as the Alliance grabbed 60% of the company's advertising budget. AMC, however, stepped out with a new Jeep ad campaign in the winter quarter, "Why drive a car when you can drive a Jeep?" to broaden its market and set the stage for the fall introduction of new XJ, a down sized line of "senior" Jeeps—Cherokee, Wagoneer and eventually a pickup truck.

The XJ is designed to appeal to non-four-wheel-drive buyers as well with fuel economy, styling, packaging and size. "Instead of taking on mud stumps, rocks and logs, Jeep wants to take on the world of ordinary cars," said a spokesman.

AMC spent about $200 million to develop the new Jeep line, the first really new Jeep since 1962. "AMC will launch a major marketing effort and ad drive for Jeeps," said Joseph E. Cappy, AMC's vp-marketing group. Mr. Cappy replaced Thomas Staudt, now general marketing manager of Chevrolet, early in 1982. Preceding the introduction of the XJ, AMC rolled back prices on Jeep CJ and Scrambler, giving them a uniform base price of $6,765.

This was an attempt by the company to get back into the market with its younger "beer can" prospects. The special price was held until the end of the model year and a $500 price cut ran through July 12 along with the warranty offer.

After extended price cuts, the Renault LeCar was eased out of the U.S.

The company plans to refocus and broaden market segments by building front-wheel-drive cars using Renault platforms and an expanded Jeep lineup. AMC is dropping its own branded line and will market all cars as Renault lines and other vehicles as Jeep in the future. Marketing felt the effects of a decision to cut the salaried work force—Ray Avedian, then Jeep ad manager, was released.

AM General got a large U.S. Navy contract which accounted largely for the 32.5% increase in profits over 1981. Despite its success, AMC is trying to sell the AMG division to concentrate solely on its automotive line. In August of this year, AMC sold its Wheel Horse Products subsidiary, based in South Bend, Ind., to a group of Wheel Horse managers.

American Telephone & Telegraph Co. increased its advertising spending by 25.8% to an estimated $373.6 million in 1982 to become the seventh largest advertiser in the U.S. Of this, measured media spending consisted of $263.5 million or 70.5% of total advertising expenditures.

Financial and operating results, in spite of a sluggish economy, showed a significant improvement over the previous year. Sales jumped from $59.1 billion in 1981 to $65.8 billion in 1982, an increase of 11.3%. A total of $29.0 billion, or 44.1% of these revenues, came from the company's local service, while $33.3 billion, or 50.6% of total revenues, came from toll services. Net income for the year was $7.28 billion, an increase of 6.7% over 1981.

Local and toll service revenues increased 11.7% in 1982, partly because of growth in business and partly because of rate increases. The company's over-all volume of business (with adjustments for rate increases) rose by 4.4% during 1982.

The rate of growth varied in the service category. WATS lines and international messages experienced strong growth, while advances in network access lines and domestic toll messages were slow.

The Bell operating companies added only 1.1 million network access lines in 1982, compared with 2.1 million in 1981 and 2.5 million in 1980.

Total toll messages increased by 3.4% in 1982, while WATS messages were up by 17%. Revenues from international and overseas calling, however, remained constant, registering $1.8 billion in 1982.

Higher intrastate rates contributed $3.5 billion to the increase in revenues in 1982, while interstate rate changes contributed $557 million. Many of these rate changes reflected the increased revenue requirements associated with accelerated capital recovery measures.

Western Electric's net income declined 52.7% in 1982, attributable largely to a decision to phase out or reduce the activities of certain Western Electric manufacturing facilities. Another factor was the reduced demand for products and services from the Bell System's operating companies.

The largest share of AT&T ad spending went to long-distance lines, which received $50.3 million in measured media support, up from $47.8 million in 1981. More than 70% of this went to network tv buys, while magazines received $6.1 million, less than half the amount spent in 1981. Yellow Pages had a budget of $16.6 million, slightly higher than the $16.2 million it received in 1981.

The regional companies had their own advertising budgets, ranging from a high of $13.2 million for Southwestern Bell to a low of $5,200 for New York and New Jersey Bell Telephone companies.

In terms of a media breakdown, the lion's share of AT&T advertising went to network tv, which saw $95.1 million in spending in 1982, up sharply from the $68.9 million of the previous year. The next largest category was spot tv, which received $65.7 million, an increase of $5.9 million over 1981 support.

Newspaper spending underwent a sharp increase as well. From $21.5 million in 1981, it jumped to $34.5 million in 1982. Magazines showed a smaller increase. They received $40.9 million in 1982, up from $35.2 million in the year before.

The year 1982 was a historic one for AT&T. It marked the period in which the company reached agreement on a consent decree with the Department of Justice that set up the guidelines for the extensive restructuring and reorganization of the company.

In August, 1983, the company agreed to a federal judge's final changes in the divestiture plan, clearing the way for the plan to be implemented on Jan. 1, 1984.

The plan provides for the reorganization of AT&T's 22 operating companies into seven independent regional organizations:

- Far West (to be called Pacific Telesis): Pacific Telephone and Nevada Bell.
- Mountains and Great Plains (U.S. West): Northwestern Bell, Mountain Bell and Pacific Northwest Bell.
- Southwest (Southwestern Bell): Southwestern Bell.
- Midwest (Ameritech): Illinois Bell, Indiana Bell, Michigan Bell, Ohio Bell and Wisconsin Telephone.
- Southeast (BellSouth): South Central Bell and Southern Bell.
- Mid-Atlantic (Bell Atlantic): Bell of Pennsylvania, Diamond State Telephone Co., Chesapeake and Potomac Cos. and New Jersey Bell.
- Northeast (Nynex): New England Telephone and New York Telephone.

Grouping the 22 companies into seven regional companies, AT&T said, will enhance the new companies' ability to raise external capital and provide opportunities for improving operating efficiency. Additional economies will flow from a central services organization that will be owned jointly and supported by the seven regionals.

AT&T will continue to exist as well, but in a smaller though powerful form. It will comprise five parts with about $43 billion in assets—down from the $155 billion of the unbroken parent. The reconfigured AT&T will consist of AT&T Communications, an expanded version of the company's Long Lines division; Western Electric, which manufactures equipment for the telephone companies; Bell Labs, which supports the research and development activity of the phone company; AT&T Information Systems, the marketer of equipment and communications services to business and residential users, and AT&T International, an overseas marketer of equipment and services.

The Information Systems unit had initially been named American Bell, but under the changes the company agreed to in August, it can no longer use the "Bell" appellation except in the Bell Labs unit.

The national long-distance unit will be AT&T's biggest line of business after the divestiture. It will be managed as a single, national unit and will have some 130,000 employes—including Long Lines employes and 80,000 people from the Bell operating companies.

The newly formed unit will provide conventional telephone service, WATS and 800 service—as well as the newer offerings, such as Dial-It 900 service.

The major building block of the evolving nationwide system will be the 4ESS digital switching system, capable of handling more than a half-million long distance calls per hour. During 1982, the Bell System added 14 more of these switching systems, bringing the total in service to 84.

AT&T Information Systems (originally American Bell), the subsidiary formed in 1982 as part of the divestiture, consists of two divisions: Advanced Information Systems (AIS), which is to market information movement and management systems for business and residential customers, and consumer products, which is to provide home and small business communications and information systems.

Under capitalization plans approved by the Federal Communications Commission, about $500 million in assets is to be transferred to the subsidiary by July 1, 1984. The unit estimates that it will require a total of $4.7 billion in capital by 1985.

The FCC's Second Computer Inquiry mandates that the unit operate independently of the other regulated entities of AT&T. It must provide its own marketing, sales and billing. In addition, it is not permitted to own any transmission facilities. However, until 1984, installation and maintenance of AT&T Information Systems' business products will be provided by the Bell operating companies and Western Electric's field service organization.

Late last year, after an extensive search AT&T Information Systems (at that time, American Bell) chose Ogilvy & Mather to handle its account. AT&T had originally asked nine advertising agencies to make presentations for the account, and four of them—Ogilvy & Mather, N W Ayer, Campbell-Ewald Co. and Ketchum Communications—spent more than two months putting together the campaign. Eventually, it settled on Ogilvy & Mather. The account is estimated to have an initial value of about $30 million and is expected to grow by about 25% per year.

Bell companies are making a concerted bid for a new segment of the telecommunications industry—cellular radio. The subsidiary, Advanced Mobile Phone Service, is applying for cellular radio franchises in most of the country's major markets and has already received permission to build in Chicago, Boston and a number of other cities.

Plans call for the subsidiary to be phased out by the end of 1983 after it has formed seven cellular radio subsidiaries, which would then be spun off to the seven regional companies.

Among other areas that AT&T is entering are videotex and the manufacture of communications equipment for the international market.

AT&T International and the Dutch electronics company N.V. Philips created a joint venture to develop, manufacture and market sophisticated telecommunications equipment outside the U.S. The joint venture will be incorporated in the Netherlands and is expected to be in operation in 1984. It would be staffed by Bell System and Philips employes.

On the legal front, AT&T suffered a number of major mishaps. Early in 1983, a federal appeals court in Chicago sustained a jury finding that some AT&T tactics against MCI Communications broke antitrust laws. The appeals court sent the case back to the lower court to determine damages stemming solely from the unlawful acts, based on a proper damage study. The jury had initially awarded $1.8 billion in damages.

The next month, AT&T lost another antitrust battle when a federal appeals court in New York ruled that the company violated antitrust laws in its actions against Litton Industries when Litton tried to enter the telephone equipment business in the 1970s. The appeals court upheld a jury order awarding Litton $276.8 million in damages.

AT&T was also sued in federal court in Chicago by General Dynamics, which charged AT&T of antitrust violations in the telecommunications equipment market. General Dynamics accused AT&T of trying to monopolize the market for business telephone systems and other telecommunications equipment by making it difficult for competitors to sell their products.

Anheuser-Busch Cos., St. Louis, the nation's 22nd largest advertiser, boosted its ad spending by 30% in 1982 to $243.4 million. For the 26th consecutive year, A-B led the brewing industry and set another all-time beer selling record with the sale of 59.1 million bbls., an increase of 8% over 1981's record year of 54.5 million bbls.

A-B now outdistances No. 2 rival Miller Brewing Co., Milwaukee, by nearly 20 million bbls. Last year A-B's market share jumped to 31.9%, an increase from the previous year's 29.5%. Of the major brewers, only A-B and G. Heileman Brewing Co. experienced beer sales increases last year.

With its hold on first place even firmer, the company now has the luxury of diversifying. For the first time, A-B acquired a consumer products company when it purchased Dallas-based Campbell Taggart bakery for an estimated $570 million in cash and stock. It also expanded distribution of Eagle snack foods and formed Anheuser-Busch Wines.

Last year saw a rash of mergers within the brewing industry. Stroh Brewery Co. took over the larger Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co.; Pabst Brewing Co. linked up with Olympia Brewing Co. and Heileman obtained Pabst breweries in Texas, Georgia and Oregon. As these "new" companies increase their presence in the important Sunbelt regions, they are all pointing their competitive guns directly at A-B.

Still, A-B's Budweiser brand remains the "king of beers" with 40.7 million bbls., which keeps flagship Bud the single most important product in the A-B stable.

The St. Louis brewer has protected its consumer franchise on two fronts by marketing Bud to both older and younger beer drinkers. The company continues to build equity in its ongoing "This Bud's for you" campaign, which salutes the "working man." A-B continued to supplement the main Bud commercials by airing a string of contemporary spots that have a tinge of "new wave." Most notable is a commercial featuring blues balladeer Leon Redbone, who is seen floating in space and singing, "This Bud's for you." A-B backs Bud with $45 million.

Last year also marked the rollout of Budweiser Light, A-B's most competitive answer yet to Miller's powerhouse Lite brand. Initial fears that Bud Light would hurt the sales of regular Bud have been quelled as the light entry only minimally cannibalized the heavier brew. There is even some thinking within industry circles that Bud Light's strong showing has been a contributor to Miller High Life's decline. High Life dropped an estimated 1 million bbls. last year.

D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, St. Louis, remains A-B's principal agency tending to Budweiser, Michelob, Michelob Light and Natural Light. Needham, Harper & Steers/USA, Chicago, handles Busch beer and Budweiser Light.

Bud Light, which went national in March, 1982, attained sales of an estimated 4 million bbls. But so far the light brew has been an expensive success. A-B spent an estimated $35 million to support its debut. Advertising has played a key role. The campaign is made of a series of commercials centering on sports competition and carrying the theme "Bring out your best."

Weekends are no longer made for superpremium Michelob, a brand which drew an estimated $27 million in ad support in 1982. The seven-year-old campaign, "Weekends were made for Michelob," and its subsequent evolution to "Put a little weekend in your week," has been replaced by a harder, more product-oriented push that highlights a beer in bottle and glass with tagline (the only spoken words): "Some things speak for themselves."

The new campaign is aimed at resuscitating Michelob, which has been stalled at the 8.5 million bbls. mark for the past three years.

Amateur sports remain the hub of Michelob Light's ad campaign. Spots showcase young men and women in hotly competitive games with superpremium Light being the ultimate award. An estimated $21 million was spent on Michelob Light's 2.5 million bbls. sold.

Natural Light continues to align itself with food in a campaign that positions A-B's first light brew as the "Beer with the taste for food." An estimated $16 million was spent to support Natural's 1.9 million bbls. sold.

Busch Bavarian is considered A-B's "ace-in-the-hole," and industry observers speculate that as the brewer adds brewing capacity Busch will become a national brand. The beer is distributed in 35 states and is being sold mostly at popular prices or discount levels in grocery stores.

One player has left the A-B roster—Wurzburger Hofbrau, an import shipped from Germany in 500 gal. stainless steel drums and bottled in A-B's Newark plant. A-B decided to use its bottling capacity there for the other brands, notably Bud Light.

First signs of A-B's disenchantment with the import came in mid-1982 when it was pulled out of some test markets on the Eastern Seaboard. The import never topped the 100,000 bbls. mark. A-B gave Wurzburger only token ad support of $101,000.

Internationally, A-B is still attempting to get a toehold. Budweiser has become the fifth-best-selling brand in Canada, where it is brewed under an agreement with Labatt Brewing Co. Michelob is also produced under this agreement. A-B is making inroads in Japan, and there is talk of a return to the U.K. where A-B withdrew from tests in 1982.

The company continues to improve and expand brewing capacity. It has opened a new plant in Baldwinsville, N.Y., and has increased the Houston plant's capacity from 5.2 million bbls. to 8.8 millions bbls. The company is exercising an option for a parcel of land in Fort Collins, Colo., for possible construction of a brewery.

The purchase of Campbell Taggart opens the door to a number of options. The bakery giant operates 70 wholesale bread and baked goods facilities, four refrigerated dough plants, three variety bread and snack food plants, two cookie and cracker plants and a refrigerated plant. It also has a number of established brand names within its bread line. Under the Merico name, Campbell Taggart is the nation's largest maker of private-label dough.

The acquisition could also provide the Eagle snack line with supermarket store delivery. Since last year, Eagle snacks have been expanding from taverns and convenience stores into larger food store chains.

At the heart of A-B's diversification efforts is the further use of its extensive beer distribution network. Such is the case with its most recent foray into wine. A-B is using its wholesalers in parts of Colorado and California to distribute Master Cellars wine, which is being produced under an agreement with Labatt Brewing, which has a winery in northern California.

Busch Entertainment Corp. reports attendance either at or above 5% in four of its five theme parks. Only Old Country theme park in Williamsburg, feeling the effects of the 1982 Knoxville World's Fair, suffered a decline in attendance, dropping 8.7% to 1.9 million.

Finally, the St. Louis Cardinal baseball team won the World Series. It had been 15 years since the team has won the Autumn Classic. Regular season attendance was a record 2.1 million customers entering the turnstyles at Busch Stadium, where A-B has the concessions.

Batus Inc., Louisville, Ky., the nation's 24th largest advertiser, spent $235 million on advertising, up 18% from the previous year.

The U.S. subsidiary of B.A.T. Industries PLC, a London-based holding company, Batus had a relatively strong year financially in 1982. Sales of the tobacco, retail and paper holding company rose 19.9% to $5.51 billion. Net earnings also increased markedly, to $214 million, up 19.1% from 1981.

Worldwide, B.A.T. Industries had sales of $20.3 billion, an increase of 14.7%, and net profit of $901 million for a 30% increase over 1981.

The year was marked by two events of high visibility. One involved the continuing controversy over the ultra-low-tar Barclay cigarets, marketed by the company's tobacco marketing unit, Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co., Louisville. The other was the $368 million acquisition of Marshall Field & Co., the Chicago-based retailer.

Brown & Williamson's efforts to bring Barclay to market and solidify its hold tended to overshadow the financial performance of the company. In 1982, B&W recorded $2.13 billion in sales, an increase of 7.7% over $1.98 million in 1981. Operating income increased even more significantly, jumping from $252.4 million in 1981 to $365.4 million in 1982, an increase of 44.7%.

The higher figures came despite a drop in B&W's market share in the competitive tobacco marketplace, declining to 13.4% from 14.0% in 1981. The company attributed the progress in the financial figures to price increases it implemented for its cigarets, a reduction in inventory levels and manufacturing efficiencies, particularly with its new cigaret factory in Macon, Ga.

The controversy surrounding Barclay, which has a 1.2% share of the cigaret market, centered on claims over its tar levels. The brand, which B&W launched in 1981 with the largest arsenal of advertising and promotion support the industry has ever seen, has been advertised as a 1mg tar/99% tar-free smoke.

But the Federal Trade Commission, acting on its own investigations and complaints by competing tobacco marketers, began expressing concern early last year over the validity of that claim. The commission said its testing methods were, in effect, "fooled" by Barclay's unique Actron filter, a filter that is the basis for B&W's claim that Barclay has fuller flavor than other ultralow-tar cigarets. The actual level, the FTC suggested, fell somewhere between 3mg and 7mg.

After a series of charges, countercharges and more charges among B&W, the FTC and other marketers, the commission in April of this year advised B&W that it could no longer cite government testing as the basis of its claim that Barclay had but 1mg of tar.

Then, in July, the FTC asked a U.S. district court for a preliminary injunction to prohibit the claim immediately. In addition, the FTC asked the nation's six cigaret companies for advice on developing a new testing system that could more accurately reflect the tar levels of Actron filter cigarets.

Judge Gerhard Gesell, who is scheduled to hear the case this month, has indicated that he, too, has questions about the validity of the FTC testing procedure following a report in the New England Journal of Medicine contending that the FTC's nicotine ratings for all cigaret brands are "misleading."

For its part, B&W has vowed to continue pressing its case. It said it has cooperated fully with an investigation of Barclay advertising, and it chided the FTC for "trying to get big headlines."

Meanwhile, B&W continued to funnel considerable advertising support for the brand, albeit at lesser levels than in 1981, the first full year the cigaret was available nationally. Leading National Advertisers reported Barclay spending in the six measured media at $52 million, 56% in magazines, 28% in outdoor and the rest in newspaper supplements.

The tug-of-war over tar claims might not be limited to Barclay itself. In 1982, B&W launched Kool Lights and Kool Ultra, the latter of which uses the Actron filter.

B&W introduced these line extensions of Kool, the company's leading brand and the No. 2 menthol in the country (R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.'s Salem is the leader), with pumped-up advertising support. In 1982, measured media spending for the Kool brand amounted to $55.1 million, a substantial boost from the $15.1 million spent the previous year. Kool Ultra alone received $19.1 million of that amount.

Of the total support for Kool, $26.8 million went to magazines, $8.2 million to newspaper supplements and $19.4 million to outdoor.

A source of pride at B&W is the growing identification of the Kool brand with the Kool Jazz Festivals, now presented in 20 cities across the country.

Yet, despite such community presence and filled-to-the-brim advertising coffers, the brand's market share continued to decline, dropping to 7.9% from 8.4% in 1981.

Combined measured media support for B&W's three other brands, none of which is among the nation's top 10 cigarets, was about half that of Barclay's alone. Raleigh, the second-ranking brand in B&W's lineup, received $13 million, compared with $12.1 million in 1981. Spending for Viceroy increased to $4.7 million from a minimal $101,200 the previous year, and Belair, another menthol, got $11.6 million, up from $10.2 million.

As closely watched as Barclay may have been, the acquisition of Marshall Field to join Batus' retail roster drew considerable attention as well. Batus, acting as a white knight of sorts, wrested Field's away from the clutches of Carl C. Ichan, a New York financier and arbitrageur, in a mid-1982 corporate takeover battle.

Batus claimed that the addition of Field's helped soothe what might have been an otherwise painful financial year in the company's retail unit. As it was, sales in the unit increased to $2.97 billion in 1982 (making it actually bigger than Batus' tobacco operations), a hefty increase of 37.4% from $2.16 billion in 1981. Operating income jumped 27%, from $126.8 million in 1981 to $161.1 million in 1982.

Without Field's, Batus would have registered a sales decrease of 2.8% for the year; operating income would have declined as well, the company said.

Besides Marshall Field's, a name that conjures up "carriage-trade" department store images in the Midwest, the deal brought the following to Batus: J.B. Ivey & Co. department stores in the Carolinas and Florida; Frederick & Nelson department stores in Washington and Oregon; Crescent stores in Spokane, Wash., and J.B. Breuner Co. home furnishing and furniture rental stores in California, Arizona and Nevada.

Among Batus' pre-Field's holdings, Saks Fifth Ave. suffered from a year of contraction, as profits declined from the record levels of 1981. Milwaukee-based Kohl's department stores, on the other hand, saw sales grow by 30.9% in 1982 over 1981, the company said. Kohl's food stores, however, retrenched somewhat, as the company, operating at a loss during the year, closed its Illinois operations, making it an exclusively Wisconsin chain.

Gimbels, another member of the Batus retail family, recorded profits for the second consecutive year, the company said. This followed a period of decline and a program to renovate and improve the efficiency of the stores, located in New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Milwaukee.

The last Batus retail unit, Thimbles, a small chain of specialty clothing stores aimed at the career woman, continued to be in a stage of development.

Measured media spending for the retail units combined totaled $16.4 million in 1982, including $4.6 million for Gimbels, $2.9 million for Saks and $2.7 million for Field's.

Also in the Batus group of companies is Appleton Papers, which had revenues of $412 million in 1982, a 2.1% increase over 1981. Operating income rose a hefty 73.1% over that period, reaching $64 million.

One brand of consumer product not part of the Batus family, but in the B.A.T. Industries fold, is Germaine Monteil cosmetics. Its advertising fig-

Fiscal year ends Feb. 28
*Totals supplied by Beatrice; 1981 restated

In the midst of a prolonged period of transition from decentralized giant to a leaner, more organized and more marketing-oriented conglomerate, this may be a watershed year for Chicago-based Beatrice Foods Co.

Even before the most recent corporate overhaul was announced in June, Beatrice was heading toward a far more aggressive marketing stance, reflected in a 35.5% jump in total marketing and advertising expenditures to $270 million in the fiscal year ended February 28, which made Beatrice the nation's 16th largest advertiser. Measured advertising totaled about $40.2 million.

Beatrice said much of the increased ad spending flowed from the company's beverage unit, which was greatly expanded in January, 1982, with the $580 million cash acquisition of Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Los Angeles, which has operations in Southern California, Hawaii, Las Vegas and Columbus, O.

Beatrice also increased its ad budget by 50% to $20 million for its Tropicana Products orange juice subsidiary, which reportedly helped it maintain a 30% market share.

But the brand attracting the largest single share of Beatrice's measured advertising was Cutty Sark scotch—more than $7.6 million, mostly for magazines, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Cutty Sark is one of several liquor and wine brands distributed by Buckingham Corp., which was acquired from Northwest Industries along with the Los Angeles Coca-Cola franchise. The company said Cutty held on to its share position in a declining scotch market. Because of last year's acquisitions, the beverage group was the only Beatrice division to show significant growth in fiscal 1983, with revenues up 56% to nearly $1.1 billion while operating earnings advanced 67% to $111 million.

Companywide, revenues reached nearly $9.2 billion in the year ended Feb. 28, 1983, a gain of only 1.8%. Net earnings, meanwhile, plunged to $43 million from $390 million in the previous year, as Beatrice took a number of special charges in February, including a $188 million after-tax writedown of goodwill associated with the 1978 acquisition of Tropicana, which has been plagued by crop shortages that hurt its performance and left its intangible assets overstated.

Beatrice's earnings were also reduced by a $30 million program ($15 million after taxes) to encourage voluntary early retirement of about 800 employes—roughly 1% of its worldwide workforce—and a $75 million after-tax divestiture reserve for Beatrice's newly announced plan to shed some 50 domestic and international companies over the next two years, which together had $872 million in sales and $36 million in pretax operating earnings in fiscal 1983.

Before the special one-time charges, Beatrice's profits reached $320.8 million last year compared with $313.2 million in fiscal 1982, before one-time gains that year from accounting changes and the profitable sale of the Dannon Co. yogurt business.

The highly decentralized company also established a corporate marketing department for the first time, headed by Harold J. Handley, formerly marketing director of Kraft's retail foods group. And in June the company announced the reorganization of its businesses into six marketing divisions—one more than before—including refrigerated foods/distribution services, beverages, grocery, consumer and commercial products, specialty chemical and international food.

The divestitures and reorganization will reduce the number of Beatrice profit centers to between 50 and 100, compared with about 400 before the recently announced divestiture program. And that comes on top of about 60 companies with about $1 billion in sales that have been sold since chairman James L. Dutt took over the helm in 1979.

The upshot is that Beatrice—which grew enormously through acquisitions from its start as a regional dairy nearly 90 years ago—is striving to replace its commodity-oriented, price-and-production mentality with a much greater emphasis on marketing higher-margin, brand-name consumer products.

A major implication of the shift to the increased marketing emphasis is that most future growth will be generated internally, rather than by spending money on acquisitions.

The renamed dairy and agriproducts group was Beatrice's second largest segment although revenues were down

6% to $2 billion and earnings were off 7% to $123 million. the second consecutive year of decline in the division's sales and profits.

The unit introduced two new Swiss Miss products to expand that hot cocoa and pudding line. Frozen pudding bars, supported last year by $702,900 in measured advertising, are now going national, and a sugar-free hot cocoa drink sweetened with aspartame, a sugar substitute, received $385,900 in measured ad spending in test markets.

In the beverages group, Tropicana eked out 2% gains in both sales and earnings, reaching about $429 million and $42.2 million, respectively. With the 50% boost in advertising and introduction of several new products, Beatrice said that "fiscal 1983 can be viewed as a year of investment in the marketplace for Tropicana."

New juice products included Chugger, an all-natural, shelf-stable, pure juice product, and the unit also introduced frozen juice bars on a stick and a line of nonalcoholic drink mixes. Tropicana's measured advertising totaled nearly $6.8 million for its various products, mostly in magazines and spot tv.

A big cloud over Tropicana's future with Beatrice dissipated in June when the Federal Trade Commission unanimously overruled an administrative law judge's decision in 1980 that the acquisition violated antitrust laws. If the decision had been upheld, Beatrice would have been required to divest not only the orange juice business it acquired for $490 million, but also profits realized since the 1978 acquisition.

The company plans continued emphasis on selling juice made from frozen concentrate to protect it from the supply problems of crop freezes it suffered in the past few years.

In the profitable wine and spirits segment, which accounts for 9% of sales and 16% of beverage group earnings, the national introduction of Waterford Irish cream liqueur continued, supported by about $1.1 million in measured advertising. Beatrice said its Mouton-Cadet wine business increased its leading share of the branded premium Bordeaux table wine market, and Finlandia vodka remained the second-largest imported vodka with measured advertising of about $1.1 million.

In the grocery group, Beatrice's largest segment, sales were flat at $2.3 billion while earnings increased 9% to $177 million. Its La Choy oriental foods business maintained its leading market share position, Beatrice said. Measured advertising for La Choy totaled about $2.8 million.

In specialty meats, various Eckrich meat products—including 13 new ones—saw a slight decrease in unit sales that matched the industry trend, Beatrice said. Eckrich hot dogs, sausage and other meat products received about $3.4 million in measured ad spending last year.

In the international foods arena, Beatrice reported earnings gains in Europe and Canada, which are its main overseas markets, and poorer results in Latin America, Asia and Australia. The company finally broke ground in March, 1983, on a joint-venture production plant in the People's Republic of China after about three years of negotiations.

Earnings rose sharply despite depressed sales for the Samsonite luggage business, aided by improved sales in the latter half of the year resulting from a doubling of advertising expenditures and new, soft-sided luggage products, Beatrice said. Measured ad spending on Samsonite was more than $4.2 million, including about $2 million for network tv, by far Beatrice's largest single commitment to that medium last year.

Although the industrial segment generally showed poorer results, sales and earnings for Culligan International improved as sales gains for residential drinking water systems offset a decline in residential water softener sales. The water softener business was supported by $1.3 million in measured ad spending.

Beecham Group Ltd., a British chemical and consumer product company and the 53rd largest national advertiser, spent an estimated $120.7 million in domestic advertising in 1982, a 21% increase from the previous year's $100 million.

Worldwide sales (in British pounds) increased 21% in 1982, while pretax earnings increased 17.4%. However, translated into U.S. dollars, the weakness in the pound for the year left Beecham with a negligible 0.6% increase in sales and decline of 2.2% in earnings.

Beecham's three divisions in the U.S. are Beecham Products in Pittsburgh, Chicago-based Beecham Cosmetics and Beecham Laboratories in Bristol, Tenn.

Acquisitions and agency changes played key roles in Beecham operations last year. With the purchase of J.B. Williams Co. from Nabisco Brands last September, for $100 million, came such strong performers as Geritol, a vitamin preparation; Sominex, the sleep aid, and Aqua Velva aftershave. In addition, Beecham purchased Schering-Plough's Dap Inc. unit for $70 million. Dap, which makes specialty paints, caulking and related home products, had sales of $90 million in 1982.

The two purchases bring Beecham's sales in the U.S. to an annual $500 million.

And, in mid-July, Beecham Cosmetics purchased Diane von Furstenberg cosmetics and fragrance business. Ms. von Furstenberg's business started in 1975 and achieved U.S. sales of more than $20 million in 1982, largely through a range of fine fragrances and bath products sold under the Tatiana brand name and color cosmetics under the Diane von Furstenberg Color Authority. The purchase price has not been disclosed.

Beecham Cosmetics, the parent company of Jovan Inc. and three other fragrance and cosmetic manufacturing operating divisions, went through some ad agency changes this year. It split its $5 million account between two agencies; Chicago-based Zwiren & Wagner is now responsible for the Jovan fragrances and related products, while Cunningham & Walsh, Chicago, handles Vitabath, Lancaster Cosmetics and Hermark (Hermes fragrances). The previous agency was J. Walter Thompson USA.

In May, New York based-Avrett, Free & Ginsberg took over Brylcreem, Lectric Shave and other Beecham products. Since the J.B. Williams Co. purchase, measured ad spending has decreased for some of the newly acquired products. Ad expenditures for Geritol tablets went from $9 million in 1981 to $7.2 million, a 20.8% drop. Sominex experienced a 54% drop, going from $2.7 million to $1.24 million. Ad spending for Aqua Velva aftershave, however, increased 59.8%, from $2 million to $3.28 million in 1982.

Ad expenditures for other Beecham products decreased as well. Spending for Cling Free fabric softener decreased 35%, going from $7.3 million to $4.7 million in 1982.

Massengill disposable douche decreased measured spending support almost 28%, from $7.5 million to $5.4 million in 1982.

Nevertheless, ad spending increased significantly in other areas. Last September, the company spent $6.2 million in a national rollout of N'ice sugarless cough lozenges.

Spending for Sucrets lozenges rose 21.6% to $4.2 million, while measured media support for children's lozenges fell from $1.4 million to $5,300 in 1982. Beecham's new three-stripe version of Aqua-fresh toothpaste continued to maintain its 13.5% market share. The brand, which is third to Procter & Gamble's (No. 1) Crest and Colgate-Palmolive's Colgate, spent $27.3 million this year, a 28% increase over 1981.

In the Jovan division, Dial-A-Tan, the company's entry into suntan products it launched a year ago, got increased expenditures, from $61,400 to $1.3 million.

Glacier, a men's aftershave, and Island Gardenia, a gardenia-based perfume and cologne, which have been on the market a year, received $318,700 and $168,100, respectively, all in magazines.

In February, Jovan introduced Gambler, a men's cologne, and Lady, a perfume—each taken from a song made popular by singer Kenny Rogers. The company signed a "high six-figure" deal to sponsor the singer for a 100-city concert tour.

Late this summer, the Vitabath division will launch a group of Zizanie de Fragonard products, a men's fragrance, for which it acquired the worldwide marketing rights.

Bristol-Myers Co., New York, the 30th largest national advertiser, is estimated to have spent $205 million on domestic advertising in 1982, a modest 3% gain over its 1981 ad spending.

The company's reported worldwide advertising and product promotion expenses of $567.1 million in 1982 represents a $12 million increase over the amount spent the previous year.

Total measured ad spending amounted to $153 million in 1982, including $105.7 million on network tv, $25.2 million in magazines and $12.6 million on spot tv. Tv Bureau of Advertising figures, meanwhile, show $127 million in over-the-air tv spending. The company had sales of $3.60 billion in 1982, a 3% increase over 1981. Net earnings rose 14% to $348.7 million, following increases of 13% and 17% in 1981 and 1980, respectively.

For the first half of 1983, worldwide sales were $1.93 billion, up from 1982's opening six months sales of $1.76 billion.

Through its divisions and subsidiaries, Bristol-Myers markets more than 1,000 products in 100 countries. Its products are grouped into four industry segments: Pharmaceutical and medical products, toiletries and beauty aids, nonprescription health products and household products. All industry segments posted sales gains in 1982, with the exception of toiletries and beauty aids, which registered a slight decline.

The pharmaceutical and medical products segment is Bristol-Myers' largest and most profitable segment and was the performance pacesetter in 1982, with $1.36 billion in sales (amounting to 38% of Bristol-Myers' total 1982 sales) and a 19% operating profit gain.

Antibiotics, cardiovascular drugs and anticancer drugs (whose sales increased 22%) are the major product categories, with antibiotics constituting half of the segment's sales. Research in these product areas, currently parcelled out among various facilities around the nation, will be centralized in 1985 when construction of Bristol-Myers' $45 million pharmaceutical research center in the New Haven, Conn., is completed.

The company's second-largest segment is the toiletries and beauty products group, in which sales amounted to $963.2 million in 1982. It was a slight decline, and a drop in antiperspirant sales was one of the culprits. Offsetting that decline was the 13% sales increase registered by the segment's largest product group—haircoloring products. Sales of beauty appliances were also on the upswing.

Nonprescription health product sales increased to $920.7 million in 1982, with sales for the nutritional products group amounting to almost $600 million, an 11% gain over 1981. Bristol-Myers' household products segment, meanwhile, rose to $355.7 million.

In the $1-billion-a-year analgesic market, its aspirin-based entries—Bufferin and Excedrin—account for a 20% market share, making Bristol-Myers the largest marketer of aspirin-based analgesics.

Bufferin and Excedrin scored big sales gains last year in the wake of the Tylenol poisonings. When sales plummeted for market leader Tylenol, marketed by rival Johnson & Johnson Co., sales of Bufferin and Excedrin skyrocketed. So did sales of Bristol-Myers' somewhat forgotten (until the Tylenol scare, that is) nonaspirin-based analgesic product entry, Datril. In fact, it was a product resurrection, and an ironic one at that.

Datril was introduced in 1975 with great fanfare in a head-to-head battle with Tylenol. When Tylenol won the war, Bristol-Myers kept Datril in its product lineup but withdrew ad support. But following the Tylenol poisonings, Datril got its first big ad push in four years. Measured media figures show that $2.2 million was spent on the product in the closing months of 1982, and the advertising restart has continued. Current tv spots tout Datril as having "exactly the same relief as Tylenol" and asks, "So, why pay more?"

Last month, the company announced that sales of Extra-Strength Datril had more than doubled since March, when it introduced its current ad campaign, and that it planned to maintain that momentum with the massive coupon redemption program launched in late August in which it placed in daily newspapers more than 43 million coupons worth $1.50 each towards the purchase of the nonaspirin product.

Measured media spending for Bufferin and Excedrin, meanwhile, totaled about $26.5 million last year, up slightly from 1981. Bufferin, now also available in capsules, got $14 million of that total, while Excedrin got $12.5 million.

In the aftermath of the Tylenol scare, Bristol-Myers began using plastic-lid cannisters with metal pull-tabs to meet the Food & Drug Administration's newly established guidelines. It is a more expensive solution (adding about five cents per package to production costs) than the packaging its competitors use, but company executives expect their cannister-packaged Bufferin, Excedrin and Datril lineup will register as safer than the competition's.

Among Bristol-Myers antiperspirant products, Ban Roll-On, the leader in the roll-on category, received $7.3 million in measured ad support last year, down about $1 million from the previous year. Tickle Roll-On received $1.5 million.

Measured spending for the Comtrex multisymptom cold remedy line was $17 million in 1982, about the same as it was in 1981, as ad spending for that line, which made its debut in 1978, seems to have leveled off following big boosts each year since its introduction. Meanwhile, a new multisymptom cough formula, Quadrin, bowed with a multimedia test campaign in Omaha in late 1982.

In the hair coloring and haircare markets, where Clairol is the dominant market presence, with its product sales accounting for 60% of the total market, sales registered strong gains. So did ad spending, with the Clairol tv budget getting a 20% increase. The company said it put $100 million into ads and promotion for Clairol last year.

Clairol's most heavily advertised hair-coloring products last year were Nice 'n Easy ($8.2 million in measured media support), Loving Care ($7 million), Miss Clairol ($5.5 million), and Clairesse ($2.4 million). Clairol Conditioner products, meanwhile, received $4.6 million in measured support, Clairol Kindness home permanents got $5 million and Final Net hairspray received $8.6 million.

The lion's share of Clairol's ad dollars goes to tv, with magazines the next preferred media. The ad strategy for Clairol Summer Blonde Lightener and Born Blonde Lightener, however, departed from that. Total measured media spending for the two products was $2.2 million and included $1.25 million in network radio time.

On the new product front, the Clairol lineup was expanded last year with the addition of the Clairol Color Renewal System, aimed at first-time haircolor users. The new entry was heralded with an aggressive $11 million introductory push, with ads likening haircare to skincare. Clairol executives see the new entry as a "bridge product" that beginners will use and then become more serious users of Clairol's other hair-coloring products.

At the Clairol Appliances division, the ad budget included nearly $2 million in measured media support for Clairol Kindness instant hairsetters, while the Foot Fixer Massager received $1 million.

Bristol-Myers markets its household product line through the Drackett division. Windex received $4.2 million in measured media spending last year. Drano liquid received $1.3 million, compared with $3.1 million the previous year, and Drano powder got $3.1 million, versus the previous year's $1.6 million, thereby equalizing spending for the two companion products over the two-year span. Endust furniture cleaner received $3 million in measured support, and Vanish toilet bowl cleaner got $2 million.

A believer in self-produced programing, Bristol-Myers was one of the first major advertisers to get involved in syndicated tv and uses it for network and spot tv supplement ads supporting its major brands. It produces the "Glenn Campbell Show" for syndication, and while new episodes of its long-running "In Search Of" series are no longer being produced, the show is a popular syndication offering.

The company has also been getting increasingly involved in cable tv as a supplementary ad vehicle and as an experimental forum where it can test commercial lengths and patterns. The company self-produces and is sole sponsor (a 10-year, $40 million deal) of the "Alive and Well" health, beauty and life style show on USA Cable. The show supports the Clairol lineup of products. Last year, an "Alive and Well" magazine was started as a companion to the show.

Cable tv ad figures put Bristol-Myers seventh among all cable advertisers, with about $4 million in measured spending in 1982.

Internationally, Bristol-Myers markets its pharmaceutical. nutritional and consumer products through its Bristol-Myers international division. The major consumer products markets are Europe, Latin America, Australia and Asia, and most of its consumer business is concentrated in haircoloring, haircare and antiperspirant products. The leading overseas brands are Miss Clairol, Nice 'n Easy and MUM deodorant. Multisymptom cold remedies, similar to Comtrex, have also been launched.

Brown-Forman Distillers Corp., affected by continuing international recession and price-cutting, pared its advertising spending 5% to $74 million for calendar 1982, ranking the Louisville, Ky.-based company 76th largest among national advertisers.

The slack in upward spending for advertising follows an increase of 21% from 1980 to 1981, and jolts B-F off the fast track it had projected for itself in 1982 when officials estimated a spending rate of $300 million "over the next three fiscal years."

The company now says that advertising and promotional support in 1984 will remain at about the same level as 1982.

rose 3% to $885 million and earnings increased 10% to $95.2 million. Stock earnings-per-share have grown steadily during the 1980s, from $2.65 in 1981 to $3.43 in 1982, and $3.76 for 1983.

Total measured advertising in calendar 1982 for Brown-Forman in newspapers, magazines, network and spot tv, spot radio and outdoor was $42 million for the period, up 11% from the $37.8 million the previous year.

Despite Brown-Forman's concerns for what it termed "lower consumer demand and heightened price competition," the company had a good year financially in fiscal 1983, and most of its major liquor and wine brands did well for the period closing April 30, 1983.

As 1983 unfolded, Jack Daniel's Black Label had moved up from No. 6 to No. 4 among largest-selling liquor brands in the U.S. as monitored by Lehman Bros. Kuhn Loeb, New York, but it declined in worldwide sales because of the recession. For its share, Jack Daniels sold 3.9 million nine-liter cases.

B-F's Canadian whisky entry, Canadian Mist, replaced Hiram Walker's Canadian Club, moving into second place in the category behind Seagram's V.O., and No. 8 over-all with 9-liter case sales of 3.7 million. The second largest-selling Kentucky bourbon, Brown-Forman's Early Times, gained 5.1% in case sales to 2 million.

Usher's Scotch made good gains. Old Bushmills Irish whisky rose moderately. Martell cognacs made sharp advances in volume. The Cella Bianco and Asti Spumante wine brands made good gains, and Korbel California Champagnes grew even faster than the rapidly expanding champagne/sparkling wine market.

Brown-Forman showed what it terms "modest volume growth" for its nine major brands, that is, those with wide depletions (wholesale-to-retail sales of more than 500,000 nine-liter cases for the year).

Of Brown-Forman's three major bourbon brands, only Early Times showed an increase in worldwide depletions for fiscal 1983, rising 2% to 2 million nine-liter cases. Early Times was dressed this year in its new parchment-style label and was backed by measured advertising totalling $1.83 million, split almost evenly between magazines and outdoor. Jack Daniel's Black Label Tennessee Whisky attracted measured ad expenditures of $5.1 million, 80% of that in magazines. Old Forester, B-F's original liquor brand, which fell 13% in case sales in fiscal 1983, drew $446,000 in spending, mostly outdoor.

Canadian Mist, separated by less than 100,000 case sales from Seagram's V.O. among Canadian whisky sales, had $8.3 million in measured media, some $4.9 million going into magazines and $3.4 million into outdoor.

While worldwide scotch drinking was off in 1982, Usher's Scotch, B-F's second largest imported brand, made a healthy gain of 7% in depletions for the year, moving 535,000 cases during fiscal 1983, a contrast to the previous year's decline of 4%.

Brown-Forman kicked off a new ad campaign for Old Bushmills Irish whisky worth $1.3 million in measured spending, $984,600 of it in magazines. The campaign, centered on the granting of the original Old Bushmills' Irish distillery license in 1607, nudged sales slightly upward.

Cella Wines, the largest of B-F's wine and specialty brands—it includes Lambrusco, Bianco, Rosato and Asti Spumante—fell 5% in depletions to 2.7 million cases from fiscal 1982. The loss came entirely from the normally best-selling Cella Lambrusco, as the white and sparkling varieties continued gaining in 1983. Cella advertising budgets total about $5.9 million, the great bulk going to network and spot tv where now-familiar Aldo Cella personifies the pleasures of wine appreciation.

Brown-Forman's premium imported Bolla wines grew 7% in the U.S. outside of New York City, but sales losses in that important market held over-all Bolla sales to an almost complete standoff—1.635 million cases in '83 vs. 1.65 million in fiscal '82. Bolla varieties include Soave and Trebbiano white wines and Valpolicella and Bardolino reds. Celebrating its 100th anniversary, Bolla has introduced Bolla Brut. Advertising totaled a substantial $6.3 million, more than half in network tv.

Southern Comfort, caught in the general downturn for liqueurs and cordials, dropped 6% in fiscal 1983 to 1.7 million cases, continuing a decline in the brand, but marketing support is hefty, and a new ad campaign has been launched after extensive market studies. Ad expenditures totaled about $5 million, including $3.12 million for magazines, $1.15 million for newspapers and $542,700 for outdoor.

Korbel California champagnes effervesced to a 26% increase for fiscal 1983 with depletions of 635,000 cases. Ad spending was about $800,000, all in magazines.

Also performing well for Brown-Forman were its premium-grade Martell cognacs. Supporting excellent gains in market share was a healthy advertising outlay—$2.1 million, most of it in magazines and outdoor.

Brown-Forman also has been restructured into a holding company configuration, with various divisions and subsidiaries falling under the Brown-Forman Distillers Corp. umbrella. Under the new arrangement, all business is now conducted through Brown-Forman Corp., a wholly-owned subsidiary responsible for all bottling, warehousing and marketing operations.

The previous marketing entities, including Jack Daniel's, B-F Spirits Ltd., The Jos. Garneau Co., and Brown-Forman International Ltd., are now independent divisions of Brown-Forman Distillers Corp.

Jack Daniel's and Old Forester/Early Times will be subsidiaries of Brown-Forman Corp. and will make inter-company sales of new whisky on an installment basis. A gain for Brown-Forman will be a substantial deferment of income taxes payable on these sales.

Just after the restructuring, B-F added a new independent subsidiary when it purchased Lenox, Inc., Lawrenceville, N.J., the famed maker of fine chinaware (as well as crystal, luggage and jewelry). Purchase price was $408 million.

CBS Inc., New York, the country's 41st largest advertiser, raised its advertising expenditures 18.6% in 1982 to $158.9 million. In 1981, the company spent $134 million.

CBS measured media spending rose in four categories: Spot tv, which increased 159%; network tv, gaining 68%; newspaper supplements, up 29%; and newspapers, up less than 1%.

CBS advertising declined substantially in network radio, cut back 85%, and outdoor, which dropped 21%, with magazine spending also down 4%.

In 1982, CBS revenues rose 4% to $4.12 billion, but net income dropped 30.9% to $112.5 million, reflecting the discontinuation of some businesses, including CBS Cable and the specialty stores division, as well as higher tv and radio programing investments.

Domestic earnings fell 24.6% to $248.6 million, while revenues increased 7% to $3.4 billion.

After a poor first quarter in 1983, during which earnings declined 46% from the same period last year and staff and budget cutbacks in the broadcast group were ordered, CBS financial results for the first six months of this year improved substantially. Revenues in the first six months increased over last year in every operating unit, with total revenues increasing 6.4% to $2.1 billion. Net income also increased in the first six months of 1983 to $76.5 million, a 30% increase.

Profit gains in the CBS Broadcast Group, however, were restricted because of a decline in tv network profits resulting from a soft scatter sales market and a sales strategy that backfired. The CBS-TV Network strategy in 1982 had been to sell less commercial time in the upfront market, in which advertisers buy commercial time "upfront" for the entire broadcast year, and to hold back greater time for sale in the scatter market. At the same time, CBS-TV ended the practice of giving advertisers guarantees of audiences in specific demographic categories, a practice continued by ABC and NBC. The scatter market, in which advertisers buy individual commercial spots on an as-you-go basis, failed to materialize as predicted and the situation was worsened for CBS as advertisers resisted buying time on the network—in part as retaliation for the network's change in its guarantees policy. While CBS/Broadcast Group executive vp James Rosenfield said earlier this year that CBS would under no circumstances change its stance on demographic guarantees, the network did grant advertisers guarantees on women audiences in prime time during the 1983-84 upfront season. Advertisers took the policy reversal as a clear indication that the CBS strategy in 1982-83 had failed.

CBS-TV Network sales during the upfront market for the 1983-84 broadcast year, while reportedly moving more slowly than its rival networks, were characterized by CBS sales officials as on target.

In 1982, the CBS Broadcast Group's revenues increased 12% to $2.17 billion. Operating profits for the group, however, declined 12% to $274.1 million. The company attributed the decline in operating profits to investments in sports and news programing and the startup in the radio division of RADIORADIO, a new network service. Further, the cost of prime time entertainment programing continued to increase. The tv stations division, however, reported improved profits.

CBS/Records Group continued its decline in revenues and operating profits, a pattern begun in 1980. Records Group revenues were down 12% to $1.07 billion, while operating profits fell 62% to $22.2 million. The company said Records Group revenues were down because of the economy, home taping and increased competition from videocassettes, videodiscs and videogames. Further, operating profits declined in large part because of the $13.1 million pretax cost of closing its audio disc and cassette manufacturing facilities in Terre Haute, Ind., and the restructuring of the sales force that led to the closing of 10 sales branches.

CBS/Columbia Group showed a 22% increase in revenues, but a 71% decline in operating profits. The revenue increase was because of the acquisition of Ideal Toys in August, 1982. In toys, profits were higher than last year, but the musical instruments operations declined sharply for the second consecutive year.

CBS/Publishing Group showed revenue gains of 6%, while operating profits dropped 11.8% to $38 million. Profits for educational and professional publishing increased, but magazine publishing operating profits declined.

In the 1981-82 tv broadcast year, CBS-TV Network posted its third straight victory in the prime time ratings war. The network also won the prime time battle in 1982-83 by a narrow margin over ABC-TV. In 1981-82, seven of the top 10-rated regularly scheduled prime time programs were on CBS, down from eight in 1980-81. The network, however, had the only new series, "Falcon Crest," to finish among the 20 top-rated programs. Last season, CBS' "60 Minutes" emerged as the highest-rated regular series.

While still in second place in the day part, CBS gained on leader ABC-TV in daytime ratings. In late-night, CBS had the highest ratings for the second consecutive year. CBS ratings declined on Saturday mornings in 1981-82 against competing programing based on popular videogames.

In sports programing, CBS-TV Network added NCAA football and, with the other two tv networks, signed a five-year $2 billion pact with the National Football League that precludes the airing of professional football games on cable tv. The contract, however, was interrupted in 1982 as the NFL players staged a 56-day strike, forcing CBS, like NBC, to air alternative programing on weekends.

The "CBS Evening News with Dan Rather" was the only network early news program to gain audience in 1981-82 and led its competition in 50 weeks during the year. The network newscast continued as the top-rated early news program in 1982-83.

In February, the network expanded its "CBS Morning News" to two hours and in March named Bill Kurtis and Diane Sawyer as co-anchors. In October, "CBS Early Morning News" was launched as a lead-in to "CBS Morning News," while "Nightwatch," a news service running from 2 a.m. to 6 a.m. (ET) also started that month.

The tv station division showed record revenues and profits in 1982, with each of the five owned stations placing first or second in their markets during the November, 1982, A.C. Nielsen ratings for local news programing. The stations also began upgrading and expanding local news and sports coverage as a countermove to inroads made by local independent stations.

The CBS radio division results suffered from the startup of RADIORADIO, a young adult programing service, as well as increased competition from other radio programing services, the loss of the NFL broadcasts during the players' strike and the increase in broadcast rights for sports programing.

The theatrical films division last year released its third film since starting operations in 1981. The division has plans to release between four and six motion pictures a year. Warner Bros. will handle domestic distribution and tv syndication of the films for the next three years. "Table for Five," starring Jon Voight, was released this year and another, "All the Sad Young Men," is planned for release later in the year.

CBS/Records Group financial results declined again in 1982 because of increased competition and the restructuring of operations and manufacturing. At the same time, the records division signed on several significant new artists to its record labels, including Men At Work, Toto, Judas Priest, Luther Vandross and The Clash. Other established recording stars on CBS labels include Billy Joel, Bruce Springsteen, Journey, Neil Diamond and Michael Jackson, whose 1983 album "Thriller" has already had four songs reach the top of the record charts. Further, Billboard magazine showed CBS' Columbia Records to be the leading label in 1982 in all major categories of popular music.

In January, 1982, CBS/Records Group created CBS Songs as a separate division, handling music copyright royalties. The songs division is now involved in developing new talent, establishing co-publishing agreements and handling rights to the MGM/UA music catalog of some 50,000 popular titles, which CBS acquired in early 1983.

Columbia House, the direct-mail marketing arm of CBS/Records Group that operates Columbia Record and Tape Club and the CBS Video Club, showed increased profits in 1982 despite the softness in the record industry in general.

CBS/Columbia Group, which includes the toys and musical instruments divisions, had disappointing financial results last year, with operating profits plummeting 71%. The acquisition of Ideal Toys provided CBS with improved capabilities in administration, warehousing, manufacturing and international distribution. Further, CBS/Columbia Group started two new units, CBS Video Games and CBS Software, while selling its specialty stores operation, Pacific Stereo.

CBS/Publishing Group's college publishing unit had record sales in 1982 resulting from its strategic shift into publishing texts for engineering, computer science and business curriculums, while maintaining its programs in the humanities, foreign languages and the behavioral and social sciences. The unit also began production and marketing of telecourses carried by local tv stations in conjunction with universities.

The group's professional publishing unit, consisting primarily of the medical publishing company W.B. Saunders, had record sales in 1982. The school publishing unit, however, had a decline in sales primarily due to declining college enrollments and cutbacks in school funding. The Holt, Rinehart & Winston general book unit also had declining sales, despite a number of best sellers. The international publishing unit, which acquired the Cassell product lines in the United Kingdom, continued to experience sales growth.

CBS consumer publishing unit's 10 magazines had fewer ad pages sold than in 1981. Copy sales and the acquisition in April, 1982, of Cuisine resulted in over-all revenue gain for the division. Woman's Day increased advertising revenues and copy sales last year, as did Field & Stream. Mechanix Illustrated and Audio ad revenues declined, but ad revenue gains were shown by Cuisine, World Tennis, Road & Track and American Photographer. Ad revenues for Cycle World were flat against 1981. Family Week, the unit's Sunday newspaper magazine, achieved record ad revenues and circulation in 1982.

Other CBS ventures include a joint venture with 20th Century-Fox Video called CBS/Fox to market prerecorded home video entertainment. CBS also entered a joint venture with Columbia Pictures and Home Box Office to establish Tri-Star Studios to produce motion pictures. CBS also operates Venture One, which conducts market tests of videotex, and Extravision, a teletext service launched in 1983.

The biggest personnel move at CBS occurred in 1983, with the retirement of William S. Paley as chairman of the company. Thomas Wyman was named Mr. Paley's successor as chairman. In 1982, Tony C. Malara was promoted to president of CBS-TV Network, from network general manager, and Jerome Dominus replaced Paul Isaccson as network tv vp-sales, with Mr. Isaccson heading up the newly created CBG/CBS Cable Group.

CPC International, Englewood, N.J., the 62nd largest advertiser in the U.S., logged an estimated $96.7 million in ad spending in 1982, up 11% from the previous year.

Worldwide sales dropped 5.8% to $4.09 billion, with company officials pointing to lower dollar values of sales and reduced prices in the U.S. as the main contributors to the decline.

On the other hand, over-all earnings were up 6% to $231.6 million primarily because of improvements in productivity and cost control.

CPC is an international group of businesses mainly engaged in grocery products and corn wet-milling. Its 2,700 varieties of grocery items include soups, sauces, bouillons, mayonnaise, margarine, corn oil, starches, peanut butter and other products, all of which accounted for 60% of CPC's total sales in 1982. Its philosophy is to keep its products in leading market positions. As the largest corn miller in the world, CPC also produces agriculture-based products for industries ranging from construction to pharmaceutical. With price drops in North America, corn wet-milling sales, which contribute 37.7% of corporate sales, fell 7% over-all to $1.54 billion.

The North American division, including such units as Best Foods, S.B. Thomas, American Resin and specialty chemical companies, experienced a decline of 8.4% in sales to unaffiliated customers, from $1.55 billion to $1.42 billion.

International marketing expenditures rose to $248.7 million, up from $242 million in 1981. The company employs advertising to promote its grocery items, but uses sales representatives to push its corn wet-milling products. Network tv again gained the most noteworthy share of ad dollars, up 9.6% from to $23.5 million in 1982.

Mazola oil, one of CPC's top products, saw a decline in U.S. volume sales offset by gains in other countries. CPC supported the product with almost $10 million in measured media ad spending, with $7.7 million of it funneled into network tv. Commercials included endorsements by the wife and son of pitcher Tommy John, then of the New York Yankees. SAMS, a division of D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, lost the $1 million Mazola Spanish-language account to Young & Rubicam's Bravo unit during the year.

Hellmann's and Best Foods mayonnaise retained high-level rates of sales, as CPC continued to weigh new uses of the products for promotion purposes.

Hellmann's won the major portion of the mayonnaise ad budget, with $6.1 million of its $7.6 million support going to network tv.

Skippy peanut butter, with measured advertising totaling $6.9 million, up from $6.7 million the previous year, saw its sales fall following a banner 1981, when it had a 55% sales increase over 1980. As peanut prices fell, Skippy prices were cut in 1982. Skippy also won a court battle to deny claims of royalty payments from the daughter of the "Skippy" creator.

Thomas' English muffins, with all of its $7.2 million ad budget ($6.7 million in 1981) directed at spot tv, and Sahara pita bread, backed by $285,300, down from more than $852,000, had what were termed "excellent" years, with almost 10% increases in sales.

Best Foods and Thomas in late 1982 switched responsibility of $11 million in tv spot buying from Porterfield Buying Unit to Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, which for some time has handled buying for Mazola oil, Skippy peanut butter and Hellmann's and Best Foods mayonnaises.

Even with an increase in ad backing, from $692,300 in 1981 to $2.7 million in 1982, Golden Griddle pancake syrup suffered declining sales, as did others in that product category. Karo, the leading corn syrup for home cooking, recorded a volume gain of 4%. The $1.7 million in media support went to magazines.

Campbell Soup Co., Camden, N.J., the 52nd largest national advertiser, increased its advertising spending to $121 million in 1982, a 71% increase from the previous year. Over the last several years, Campbell has graduated from a well-oiled, semisomnolent production machine to a company poised for growth through acquisitions and continuous new product gestation.

The prime mover has been R. Gordon McGovern, who took over as Campbell's president-chief executive officer in December, 1980, bringing with him a five-year plan calling for structural and philosophical changes in the Campbell modus operandi. The blueprint calls for a 5% annual unit volume growth, 15% annual sales growth, a 72% increase in marketing expenditures, a near doubling of the advertising budget and the addition of two major new products a year.

It has also involved a decentralizing of corporate management to facilitate entrepreneurial risk taking and new-product development—a tack that Mr. McGovern took as president of Campbell's Pepperidge Farm subsidiary, his position immediately prior to his current post. Campbell's U.S. division has been divided into eight strategic profit centers: Soups, beverages, pet foods, frozen foods, fresh produce, main meals, grocery and foodservice. A ninth, health and fitness, was to deal in foods, equipment or programs that promote physical fitness.

In the last year, Campbell began marketing a Pepperidge Farm line of premium frozen poultry products via an arrangement with Barber Foods, Portland, Me.; made plans to distribute a new apple juice product as a result of having purchased Costa Apple Products, Highland, N.Y.; acquired for its Campbell Hospitality's "Tuesday's," a Southeastern theme restaurant chain; started test marketing Pepperidge Bake-at-Home bread in Syracuse and New Orleans, and introduced into limited test Chunky for Cooking, a line of blended ready-to-serve sauces.

If these ventures go the way of others in recent Campbell history, the company will be pleased. Recent new product successes include Le Menu, a line of low-calorie frozen foods competing with Stouffer's Lean Cuisine; Prego spaghetti sauce, and Pepperidge Farm's Deli's and Vegetables 'n' Pastry—all of which represent Mr. McGovern's penchant for convenient foods that are also interesting and nutritious.

Introduced into western test markets last year, Le Menu achieved national distribution this spring—but only after its rousing western success caused the company distribution difficulties. Initial western sales reportedly ran some 70% above projections.

Although Le Menu has not been positioned specifically as a diet dinner, each member of the eight-item line contains fewer than 500 calories, reflecting Campbell's desire to increase its market presence among lighter, low-calorie foods.

Introduced last year, Prego spaghetti sauce has given Chesebrough-Pond's Ragu—long the dominant spaghetti sauce—a run for its money. Today, Prego has achieved more than 20% share of sauce sales in its market, good for more than $100 million in retail sales. The total spaghetti sauce market is gauged at some $600 million annually and climbing. Campbell is projecting that Prego will snare 25% to 30% of the national market by this fall.

The company is testing Prego soups in Cincinnati and Syracuse and is researching a line of Italian frozen entrees and dinners, along with a family of bread products that could be produced by Pepperidge Farm. More than likely, a successful soup test could spawn an entire generation of Prego products.

Campbell's Pepperidge Farm subsidiary last year introduced Vegetables 'n' Pastry, a batch of vegetables in a sauce, wrapped in puff pastry. The line includes: Asparagus in mornay sauce; mushrooms dijon; zucchini provencal, spinach almondine in a light cheese sauce, and broccoli in cheese sauce. Like their gourmet predecessor, Pepperidge Farm's Deli's, Vegetables 'n' Pastry is targeted mainly at smaller households, particularly working women and men cooking for themselves, who need something fast, convenient, nutritious—and a little fun, too.

During Mr. McGovern's tenure at Pepperidge Farm, the subsidiary became the star performer in the Campbell galaxy, and remains the fastest growing of its operating divisions; as such, last year PF recorded a sales gain of 19%, with volume alone accounting for 12%. Operating earnings were $41 million and represented 14% of the corporate total.

According to Campbell, new products contributed to some 90% of PF's fiscal 1982 volume gain. In addition to its forays into the nondessert market, last year Pepperidge introduced strawberry, apple spice with pecans and apricot-raspberry varieties of its fruit cookies. The division also added two more flavors to its snack bars line, apple nut and blueberry.

Over the past few years, Campbell has also been in an acquisition mood, in keeping with its chief's stated intention to acquire companies that will add at least $200 million to Campbell sales every two years.

According to analysts, Campbell prefers small, fast-growing companies strong in product areas where Campbell is not. In the spring of 1982, Campbell bought Philadelphia-based Mrs. Paul's Kitchens, the leading U.S. producer of frozen fish. At the time of its purchase, Mrs. Paul's commanded some 25% of the frozen fish market, with 65 frozen food varieties and some $124 million in sales.

Other recent acquisitions showing Campbell's interest in health and nutrition include Juice Bowl, a producer of citrus juices that reportedly is the largest single supplier to the airlines and Costa Apple Products, through which Pepperidge Farm is test marketing an apple juice in two New England cities.

Campbell recently began an Arizona test of Juice Works, a blended 100% pure fruit juice drink. The product, which comes in canned, bottled and frozen concentrate, has four flavors: Cherry, grape, apple and orange.

In 1982, the soup unit's marketing expenditures totaled $57 million, a 45% increase from the previous year. The U.S. division's over-all marketing budget—$118 million in 1982—has increased 72% since 1980, a McGovern mandate. Campbell says it plans to keep accelerating that budget.

In addition to Le Menu, the Swanson division, which over the last few years has undergone a substantial revamping of priorities to fight slipping sales, has been test marketing Plump & Juicy fried chicken, cooked in special ovens to obtain light and crisp batter. According to Campbell, a West Coast test garnered 37% more sales than the old Swanson product. Campbell expects Plump & Juicy to be available nationally this fall.

A Campbell subsidiary since 1978, Vlasic Foods showed a 9% sales growth and a 21% boost in operating earnings last year—despite a modest decline in pickle-product consumption. While Vlasic remains committed to low-cost production, marketing expenses jumped 27% in 1982, to $31.4 million. According to Campbell, Vlasic will fuel growth by introducing new products in growth categories—i.e., last year's introduction of low-sodium and low-calorie Lite pickles, test marketed in Phoenix, St. Louis and Kansas City.

Other new Vlasic items include: La Especial Mexican sauces and refrigerated products such as Win Schuler's Bar-Scheeze, made possible by the 1982 purchase of Win Schuler Foods, a Michigan-based producer and distributor of specialty cheese spreads and flavored melba rounds sold through retail, foodservice and mail-order channels. Win Schuler also produces foodservice salad dressings, party dips and sauces.

Holding strong in a generally depressed camera market, Canon U.S.A., the Lake Success, N.Y.-based division of the Tokyo company, ranked 96th among the nation's advertisers with 1982's total ad expenditures of $47 million, up 28% from the year before.

In a year when copiers surpassed cameras as the company's largest single product line, U.S. sales shot up 23.2% to $820 million. Worldwide sales rose 23.2% to $2.45 billion. Within the worldwide total, sales of photo products rose 11.3% to $941 million, while sales of business machines fared even better, jumping 53.4% to $1.3 billion.

Canon, possessor of myriad camera models for rank amateurs through professionals, introduced several new models and features in 1982.

The big news was the introduction of the Snappy, the smallest and lightest Canon 35mm camera yet. The Snappy, with its snazzy—yet simple—design, is Canon's first move into the instamatic market which for so long has been dominated by Kodak, with 33% of the market, and Polaroid, with 28%.

Sales of the Snappy have exceeded company expectations. An estimated 50,000 were sold each month, and production levels rose 40% only a few months after the mid-1982 launch. As a result, Canon sold 50% more compact cameras last year than in 1981.

Two Snappy models inaugurated the line, the Snappy 20, with a suggested price of $115, and the higher-brow Snappy 50, priced at $145. Both weigh 10.5 oz. and take negatives that are about 11 times larger than those of Kodak's Disc camera, thus providing finer detail and color when printed.

To market the Snappy, Canon has allotted about $40 million through 1985 and aimed it primarily at women, who constitute about 75% of snapshooter purchasers. Advertisements stress that family snapshots are important personal documents deserving 35mm quality.

Canon also continued to push its warhorse of camera lines, the "A" Models. The company introduced the AL-1, with a built-in quick-focus mechanism that eases the difficulty of finding a sharp focus. The AL-1 joins such sister cameras as the premium-priced A-1 and the popular AE-1, which in 1976 became the first single lens reflex camera promoted on network tv.

Largely because of the "A" Line of cameras, Canon now controls about one-third of the U.S. market in 35mm cameras. And although Canon's global sales declined slightly last year, its market share inched upward. North America is the largest market for Canon photo products, responsible for about 33% of all sales, followed by Japan and Europe with 29% each.

Professional athletes such as Tracy Austin and Joe Theismann continued to hawk the A Models, touting the now popular, "So advanced it's simple" slogan. Skier Phil Mahre was the new sports celebrity added to the line-up of Canon endorsers in 1982.

A new Sure Shot camera was introduced last year, beefing up the compact 35mm line. The newcomer is totally automatic, with auto-loading, auto-winding, an infrared auto-focus system, programed time exposure and built-in auto-flash. The first Sure Shot was introduced in 1979 and has since captured 25% of the compact 35mm market. Cameras, however, took a back seat to office machines in 1982, as copiers emerged for the first time as Canon's biggest seller. In North America, business machines accounted for 50% of sales last year, with photo products providing another 47% and optical products, 3%.

The big news in copiers was the introduction of the Personal Cartridge Copier, or the PC line, the world's smallest, lightest and least expensive plain paper copiers. The small PC copier contains only one-third of normal copier components, and its nearly maintenance-free design places all heavy-maintenance features such as drum, toner and developer in a disposable cartridge. The life span of the cartridge is approximately 2,000 copies, and replacement cartridges cost about $65 for black toner and $70 for blue or brown toner.

Two models of personal copiers were unveiled, the PC-10 and PC-20. The PC-10 lists for about $995 and features a single-sheet feeder. It became available this spring. The PC-20 lists for $1,295 and boasts multicopy capacity. It will become available this autumn. Canon expects to reach production levels of 20,000 PC-10 and PC-20 machines a month during the line's first year, and achieve sales of 10,000 a month in North America by the end of 1983. Actor Jack Klugman has been chosen as spokesman for the PC line. Dentsu is handling the advertising, which stresses the simplicity of the copiers.

About one million Canon copiers have been sold in the last 15 years, and the company now claims to be making more copiers than any other manufacturer worldwide. Helping to boost copier sales were two new NP models.

These are the NP-125, with enlargement and two-way reduction, and the NP-300, with 30-copy-per-minute speed plus reduction.

Canon researchers recently unveiled the prototype for a laser copier, which runs on digital signals and may be connected to other equipment such as microcomputers, facsimile transceivers and word processors. No word yet on either a price or an introduction date.

The laser copier is but one of Canon's many research projects, helped along last year by a hefty 62% rise in r&d funds to $99.8 million. Typewriters, first introduced by Canon in 1981, were another beneficiary of research dollars, as the company began turning out AP-500 and AP-400 electronic typewriters in early 1982. These top-of-the-line products boast such features as a built-in interface so that they can function as correspondence-quality printers for the Canon AS-100 microcomputer. Future plans call for the introduction of lower-price typewriters with more mass-market appeal.

While patent-creating innovations are a Canon hallmark, so is the company's close association with sports. Last year was no exception, as Canon launched it largest sports campaign to date during the World Cup soccer matches, where it had secured exclusive supplier and marketing rights. Estimated tv audience exposures for stadium billboards alone ran to over 10 billion people. No doubt Canon hopes to match or exceed this figure during the 1984 Olympics in Los Angeles, where it will be the official supplier of 35mm cameras. And the company scored unexpected points during Canon-sponsored Super Bowl XV, when Canon-endorser Joe Theismann led the Washington Redskins to victory.

Chesebrough-Pond's, the nation's 48th largest national advertiser, decreased its domestic advertising spending by approximately 4% to $131 million in 1982.

After 10 years of sharp percentage increases in earnings, Chesebrough-Pond's earnings rose only 6.7% to $125.2 million last year. By comparison, its 1981 net income jumped 14.6%. Last year, sales were $1.62 billion, up slightly from $1.55 billion in 1981.

The company blames this slowdown on an economy that produced sluggish consumer spending patterns and severe retail inventory reductions, especially affecting its Prince Matchabelli and Health and Beauty Products divisions. To spur greater growth in 1983, C-P is investing heavily in marketing and controlling its nonmarketing business costs.

Additional advertising expenditures, however, were seen as a major contributor to earnings declines of 10.8% and 13.5%, respectively, during the 1983 first and second quarters. Sales for the first six months of 1983 increased modestly to $791.2 million from $788.4 million in 1982, while net income dipped to $53.3 million compared to $59.7 million a year ago.

Chesebrough-Pond's total advertising spending for the first six months of this year rose about 16% from 1982's first half to about $76 million, a record level for the company.

This aggressive marketing strategy is expected to continue throughout 1983 with sales increases anticipated as a result, said Ralph E. Ward, chairman-president.

Ad expenditures for Health & Beauty care products were $31 million in 1982, down about 15% from $36.7 million in 1981. As in 1981, however, a large chunk of the division's budget —$12.5 million—went to the Vaseline product line. Vaseline petroleum jelly remains the leader with about a 90% share of that market. But it was another of the line's category leaders—Vaseline Intensive Care lotion—that received the largest individual share of the division's advertising dollars, about $7 million. Vaseline Intensive Care holds about a 20% share of its market category.

In general, the Health & Beauty care division—which includes such mainstays as Q-Tips and Pond's cold cream —felt intense price competition from other name brands. This heated competition prompted Chesebrough to move deeply into trade allowances, cents-off coupons and other promotional tactics. These moves contributed to the division's reduced operating profit, to an estimated $52.5 million last year, from $54.7 million in 1981. At the same time, division sales rose only a modest 0.7% to $271.3 million.

Among the new products introduced in 1982 were a line of Cutex Perfect Color nail polishes, an improved Cutex polish remover with moistureguard formula and Pond's Essential cleansing lotion and make-up remover.

In early 1982, the company pushed to get these new Cutex products into drugstore chains, where most of the nailcare business is done. This all-print endeavor was modeled after the early Revlon strategy that pushed the Revlon name into national prominence. Cutex advertising ran almost exclusively in magazines.

For its new Pond's Essential cleansing lotion, however, Chesebrough spent nearly $2 million, mostly in network tv, with some magazine and spot tv support.

In the home permanent category, Chesebrough-Pond's Rave still ranks No. 1, although it is down about 6 share points since last year and now holds about a 20% share of that market. The company spent $9.2 million on the Rave line last year, according to Leading National Advertisers.

Chesebrough-Pond's package foods division was among its most successful units last year. With the new Ragu Homestyle spaghetti sauce making the major contribution, sales rose 19.3% to $317.3 million and C-P, without breaking out the numbers, said the division's operating profit advanced an even stronger 30.7%.

Ragu Homestyle spaghetti sauce, introduced late in 1981, has emerged as one of the most successful new grocery products in years and has strengthened the Ragu brand's leadership position in the spaghetti sauce category. Ragu Homestyle sauce sales were fueled last year by a hefty $14 million advertising campaign, exclusively in network and spot tv.

Introduced in 1982 were two new Pizza Quick sauces and a pizza crust mix under the Pizza Quick name. Approximately $7 million was spent on these new products to promote the theme, "Homemade pizza, simple as pie."

As for the foods division over-all, which includes four other Ragu products, analysts' projections for 1983 remain upbeat. Recently released figures report that in the second quarter of 1983 the division netted $79 million in sales, up from $73.7 million a year earlier.

The Prince Matchabelli division emerged as Chesebrough's main trouble spot in 1982, but signs of improvement began to emerge this year. In 1982, division sales were only $109.4 million, down nearly 16% from $130 million in 1981, when it reported sales gains in cosmetics. About half of the division's sales come from fragrances, 40% from Aziza cosmetics and 10% from Erno Laszlo prestige skincare products and cosmetics.

The division suffered not only because of a soft fragrance market but, as Mr. Ward told Advertising Age, because "of our lack of perception, a lack of leadership and a lack of ideas."

Part of Matchabelli's declining fortunes can be related to its abandonment of a marketing approach in fragrances geared to short product life cycles—an approach it pursued aggressively in the 1970s. The division pulled back from aggressive fragrance marketing several years ago; last year, its fragrance marketing budgets were cut by an estimated 20% from the $10.2 million it invested in 1981 in its women's and men's fragrances.

Advertising in 1982 was an estimated $7.5 million, with about half that sum spent on the Aziza line, which received ad support of $4.2 million in 1981.

But in a drastic turnaround, advertising for the Matchabelli division during the second quarter of 1983 alone is up 85% from year-ago figures. And as a result, sales are picking up too, according to the company.

Several new products have been introduced this year as well, including the Aviance Night Musk fragrance line, launched in the first quarter. In the second quarter, Chesebrough brought out Cachet Noir fragrance line, a more sophisticated version of its popular Cachet.

A new line of eye shadows and eyeshadow pencils were also brought out this year and plans are in the works for a new mass-market women's fragrance in early 1984.

Chesebrough-Pond's Bass shoe division last year saw sales jump 13% to $140 million from $123.2 million, and last year extended its Bass Country Shops, a sort of department store boutique, into 160 stores, including Bloomingdale's and Marshall Field & Co. It also recently introduced factory outlet stores in New England.

In 1982, the division spent an estimated $1.8 million on Bass advertising, mostly in magazines, up from $1 million in 1981. Last year the company also purchased certain assets of Fun Striders, a California-based maker of footware sold under the brand names Fun Striders and Bare Traps.

Second quarter 1983 reports for Bass, however, are not as positive. Sales of Bass women's footwear, comprising the bulk of the division's sales, declined from last year. And although Bass men's footwear sales increased, the division's over-all sales slumped during that quarter to $32.7 million from $36.5 million the year before.

One of Chesebrough-Pond's most successful divisions is also its newest —the Prince division—created in July, 1982, with the acquisition for $64.4 million in stock of Prince Mfg. Inc., one of the leading makers of high-quality tennis racquets.

Prince sales increased 60.8% to $56.9 million and operating profit rose 52.4%. Sales for 1981 were $34.9 million. This growth has continued so far in 1983. The company introduced a new top-of-the-line Prince Boron racquet. Advertising for the entire division was just over $1 million last year, but Prince tv commercials were prominent during the Wimbledon and U.S. Open tennis tournaments this summer.

At the Health-tex division, sales in 1982 rose to $281 million from $251 million while operating profit grew 10.2%. The division introduced three new lines last year: Beach Babies swimwear for infants and toddlers and the Our Girl and Ready Set Go lines of girls' apparel. Ad spending for Health-tex was about $1.8 million.

Last March, C-P moved its Wind Song, Chimere, Cachet and Matchabelli for Men fragrances to William Esty Co. from Scali, McCabe, Sloves.

Media and promotional expenditures: Now you can allocate with precision.

With today's pressure for strict cost controls, the proper targeting of media and promotional dollars has become a vital concern at all levels of marketing management.

Despite this demand for accuracy, however, most planners have had to accept the unpleasant fact of transshipments—spill-in and spill-out—and the equally disturbing reality that because of them, most Brand Development Indices (BDI's) are necessarily inaccurate.

The BRAND DEVELOPMENT ANALYSIS system is Progressive Grocer's answer to this dilemma. This unique and highly accurate program generates a new BDI for each of your markets recognizing the full impact of spill-in/spill-out, and providing a precise standard for media and promotional planning.

Chrysler Corp., Highland Park, Mich., the 35th largest national advertiser, decreased its ad spending in 1982 to $173 million, a drop of 10.4% from the previous year.

For the year, Chrysler was able to cut operating losses despite declining vehicle sales. The company, helped along with the $335 million sale of Chrysler Defense to General Dynamics in the first quarter of 1982, recorded its first profit since 1977.

Sales were $10.05 billion in 1982 compared with $10.82 billion the year before, the latter figure including a full year of Chrysler Defense, which was sold. Restated sales for 1981 were $9.97 billion.

Unit sales worldwide fell to 1,171,726 in 1982 from 1,283,013 the year before. Chrysler's U.S. car share rose slightly to 10% from 9.9% and truck share climbed to 9.5% from 8.2%.

The big ad move at Chrysler was the return of BBDO to handle the Dodge business (it began work in 1983), splitting off a good chunk of billings from Kenyon & Eckhardt, which was left with corporate, Chrysler-Plymouth and captive import advertising. BBDO had handled Dodge until 1979, when it was dropped in an austerity move.

Chrysler's ad spending fell off from the near frenzy levels of 1981 with the biggest drop in spot radio—a medium used for quick announcement of special promotions. Spot radio dropped 76% to about $12 million while other expenditures held even. Network tv did increase 24.5% to $68.2 million.

The agency addition was part of a company move to increase separate divisional identities. Joe Campana stepped into the vp-marketing spot, replacing Jack Givens, who left the company. He created the post of general marketing manager for two divisions. A.C. (Bud) Liebler took that post for Chrysler/Plymouth and Joseph Caddell at Dodge.

Messrs. Liebler and Caddell created distinct images for their respective divisions and small product differences began to crop up.

For example, Mitsubishi split off from Chrysler more dramatically as it began to market its own cars in the U.S. in 1982. Chrysler and Mitsubishi came to an agreement which guaranteed Chrysler a steady flow of the imports for its own showrooms in return for loosening its grip on the Japanese car maker in the U.S.

Chrysler car sales followed industry trends: Big and luxurious cars did well while small, economy cars lost sales. Chrysler's best-selling line, the K-car Dodge Aries and Plymouth Reliant, had a sales drop of 25% to 259,838 units in 1982. The subcompact Omni/Horizon line also fell 33.9% to 86,909.

The K-car sales decline was more than made up for by Dodge 400/Chrysler LeBaron line—K-cars in luxury trim. In its first full year, the 400/LeBaron had sales of 117,521. Another trim-created new model, the New Yorker Fifth Avenue (built from the Cordoba chassis) had sales of 62,725 in its first full year.

The Imperial was one of the few luxury cars that didn't do well in 1982. Imperial sales were so low in 1982 that Chrysler decided to drop the line during spring of that year. Imperial sales sunk 44% to 2,601.

Following a year filled with corporate advertising designed to make people believe Chrysler was a going concern, company marketers tried to get back to product advertising in the fall of 1981, the beginning of the 1982 model year. Chrysler, Chrysler-Plymouth (C-P) and Dodge ads overflowed with star presenters. Ricardo Montalban spoke of the secret dreams of Lee Iacocca, Kelly Harmon let her hair flow in various sporty Dodge cars, Walt Garrison looked tough in Dodge trucks and John Houseman spoke distinctly about Plymouth Reliant.

Despite this focus on product early in the model year, by mid-October 1981 Chrysler followed others in the industry in introducing rebates on almost all the vehicles that didn't fall under a "holding the line on price" effort.

Rebates continued in various forms through the spring of 1982 and into the winter. In March, rebates of $750 to $2,000 got a new theme line, "If you can find a better rebate, take it." That played off Mr. Iacocca's closing line, "if you can find a better car, buy it."

Chrysler tried to kick the rebate habit by offering a 50,000-mile warranty in the spring as the company responded to similar offers from Ford. The warranty would prove long-lived but unsuccessful in curbing rebates. Another set of rebates was dished up on Dodge trucks in June, ranging from $300 to $1,000. Still unable to resolve the presence of rebates and special interest rate offers, Chrysler followed other car makers into special interest rate offers into the winter of 1982-83, undercutting GM's and Ford's 9.9% springtime offers with a 9.8% rebate. Rebates were offered as an alternative to the special rates and ranged from $400 to $750.

The company's desire for divisional identity carried over to agency K&E, which opened a division of its own in Los Angeles, dubbed K&E's Import Car Agency. It began to handle all the Chrysler captive import advertising. Also in the spring, Chrysler decided to eliminate the middleman, K&E, on media billings and took the payment process in-house.

The effort to develop separate images for Dodge, Chrysler and C-P began anew in the fall. Ricardo Montalban got expanded duties as spokesman for the entire Chrysler line. Plymouth kept the theme line, "The American way to get your money's worth," but dropped John Houseman as spokesman.

Dodge kept the "America's driving machine" theme but dropped Kelly Harmon. Actor William Devane stepped in as spokesman for the new Dodge 600ES. The 600ES was compared in ads to a Mercedes, a theme later dropped (because of the agency shift), but also found faulty by the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus. Comparative ads also were designed for the Omni/Horizon subcompact and Dodge Charger 2.2. The Omni/Horizon drag raced Ford Escort, and Charger beat Firebird Trans Am and Chevrolet Camaro Z28 in a similar race.

Dodge trucks continued with the "Ram tough" theme and kept Walt Garrison as spokesman, although they fell into the rebate mode in June, offering rebates of $300 to $1,000.

The captive imports also kept their "master car builders of Japan" theme, but Plymouth changed the name for its subcompact import, Champ, to Colt partially because the Champ name had poor recognition among consumers.

Particular regions began to get specific attention from Chrysler in the fall. A "Texas truck" promotion was mounted in that state. In California, the captive imports and Shelby Charger, a tweaked version of the Omni coupe, got added attention.

On the consumer side, price freezes at Chrysler and other companies on '83 models made '82 models hard to clear out at the end of the summer. Chrysler introduced rebates of $300 to $600 on most '82 leftover models in November.

The first set of commercials from BBDO for Dodge broke this February identifying the Dodge 600 family sedan as a big car with small-car features (gas mileage, etc.).

Later in the winter, Chrysler latched onto shared car sponsorship on United States Football League telecasts with a deal that included ESPN and ABC use of Iacocca spots for the Statue of Liberty, Ellis Island Foundation. Chevy objected to Mr. Iacocca appearing in spots during the games it was sponsoring and offered to make non-Iacocca public service spots for the foundation. Mr. Iacocca, chairman of the foundation, refused that offer. The stalemate was never resolved.

Chrysler didn't try to keep many secrets about upcoming models for the '84 model year. A sports car, Chrysler Laser and Dodge Daytona, was scheduled for fall introduction and a "garageable van" known as the Plymouth Voyager and Dodge Caravan were due. Models slated for 1985 include the "H-car" aimed at the Honda Accord and a reskinning for the K-cars Reliant and Aries. The company will eventually build its own compact pickup truck. On the captive import side, a Chrysler version of the Mitsubishi Starion, a turbocharged sporty car, is scheduled for the fall introduction period as an '84 model.

Mr. Campana was looking to new models to help build images for Dodge and Plymouth during the '84 model year. Chrysler and Dodge truck images were set already, he noted.

Up at Highland Park, Ralph A. Sarotte became director-product marketing plans and William R. Coley became manager of corporate merchandising in the Campana regime. Additional marketing personnel changes included Arthur Kesteloot to C-P national ad manager, from vp and management supervisor, J. Walter Thompson, Dearborn, Mich.; Joseph Cronin to Dodge national ad manager from Dodge ad manager; John Damoose became Dodge merchandising manager from merchandising director and Ed Fleming became C-P merchandising manager from manager-marketing plans.

Chrysler's Canadian operations recovered from a market share slide in 1981. Chrysler car sales in Canada rose to 105,264 in 1982 from 103,031, giving the company a 15.4% share, up from 12.9% in 1981. Truck sales fell to 21,328 from 29,463 but truck market share still increased to 12.1% from 10.7%.

Chrysler de Mexico suffered from three peso devaluations, reporting a loss of $69.3 million in 1982 compared with a profit of $19.2 million the year before. Earnings in other international operations dropped to $10.7 million in 1982 from $37 million in 1981.

In the fall, Chrysler bought ABKO Properties for $119.1 million, regaining control of more than 400 dealerships. The dealerships had been controlled by a wholly-owned subsidiary, Chrysler Realty Corp., before they were sold in 1979.

Chrysler also bought a Volkswagen-owned plant (for Rabbit production) in Sterling Heights, Mich., which Chrysler will use to build compact H-cars for 1985 introduction.

In 1982, Clorox continued the course it has followed since 1969, when it became independent from its short-term parent, Procter & Gamble.

It has been attempting to transform itself from a company dependent on a single product into a broad-based consumer products marketer along the lines of its former parent. It has been pursuing diversification through acquisitions and inhouse research and development of new products.

In 1981, Clorox acquired Comerco Inc., Tacoma, Wash., marketer of Olympic and Carver Tripp paints and stains. In 1982, it furthered its stake in the $4 billion (wholesale) architectural coatings business by acquiring U.S. marketing rights to DuPont's Lucite consumer paints. The move puts Clorox into the interior segment of the paint market for the first time and places it firmly in the hotly competitive "do-it-yourself" segment of the market dominated by Sears, Roebuck & Co. The company also faces strong competition from Sherwin-Williams, Glidden and Pittsburgh Paints.

The Lucite acquisition gives Clorox a firm position in the moderate-price portion of the market and will likely strengthen efforts to build distribution of Olympic paints and stains into mass-merchandise outlets. Lucite currently holds a 5% share of the interior paint market and a 3% to 5% share of the exterior business. Higher-price Olympic has a similar share of the exterior paint market, but commands a 40% share of the $200 million-to-$250 million exterior stain business.

But 1981 and early 1982 weren't easy for Clorox's Olympic division by any means. The drastic decline in housing starts, high interest rates and a slowdown in housing resales in many areas of the country hurt the business. To cope, management instituted programs to cut transportation costs and increase efficiencies. Until the economy improves substantially, volume is expected to remain depressed.

The backbone of Clorox's operation —indeed 70% of total sales—is its household products business. Shipments of U.S. household grocery products were ahead for the 11th consecutive year and achieved a record in fiscal 1982. The company continued its new product push.

Among new products it's testing: Wave, an all-fabric dry bleach; Fresh Step, an odor-controlling cat litter; Clorox Fresh Scent, an herbal-scented version of its chlorine liquid bleach; a reduced-odor version of Tilex instant mildew stain remover, and a bottled version of its Hidden Valley Ranch salad dressing.

While the company has been riding high on the successes of new products such as Tilex instant mildew stain remover and Clorox Pre-Wash, bleach sales still dominate.

Clorox executives point out that the company is making progress in building its nonbleach businesses, stating that bleach (both liquid and dry) accounts for less than 50% of total earnings from established brands. Clorox is estimated to have a slightly less than 60% share of the U.S. bleach business.

While the company continues to plot its nonbleach course, it is ironically facing a challenge from P&G in its core business. Since 1981, P&G has been testing Vibrant, a dry bleach that some say has the power to make chlorine liquid bleach obsolete.

Clorox's Wave, testing in Nashville, Oklahoma City and Louisville (the product was earlier taken out of Bakersfield, Cal.), is its answer to the potential Vibrant threat. Like Vibrant, Wave is also positioned as a heavy-duty bleach able to provide the whitening power of chlorine liquid with the safety of a dry. Clorox executives—at least in public—play down the significance of the Vibrant launch, arguing it is not the technological breakthrough P&G claims. And, say Clorox executives, the fact that both companies are out with products positioned identically simply reflects that there currently is a gap in the marketplace that isn't being filled.

While Clorox may have much of its energies focused on building its businesses outside bleach, its new test product, Fresh Scent, the reduced-odor version of Clorox liquid, shows the company definitely intends to maintain its leadership position in the $500 million bleach business (at retail). Last year in an interview, Clorox group vp Jack Collins noted that despite bleach's currently sluggish 2% annual growth rate, he believes there is a sizable untapped potential market for Clorox liquid among the 75% of the U.S. population that doesn't use chlorine bleach.

As Clorox was taking growth steps, it also got rid of aspects of its business it concluded did not fit into over-all strategy. In 1982, it discontinued marketing Duraflame firelogs, a product acquired in 1978. Clorox executives put the blame for Duraflame's demise on the sorry state of the firelog business, which had been plummeting at a staggering 20% to 25% annual clip, because of substantial price hikes resulting from escalating costs.

Clorox also withdrew from the United Kingdom, selling its only brand there, Twice As Fresh air freshener, to Reckett & Colman

Monitor Products, a small cabinetry operation that was part of the Comerco acquisition, also was sold during the year.

Management changes during the year: President Calvin S. Hatch, 61, was elected chairman, effective July 1, 1982; he continues as chief executive officer. Mr. Hatch succeeded Robert B. Shetterly, 67, who retired as chairman, but continues as a director. Executive vp C.R. Weaver, 53, was elected president and chief operating officer, also effective, July 1. In addition, four new officers were elected: David G. Koncelik, controller; Donald C. Murray, vp-Latin America and Asia; Ralph C. Richter, vp-international division, and G. Roger Victor, vp-Olympic stain division.

Clorox made several agency changes during the year. The company assigned its Liquid Plum'r, Clorox Pre-Wash and Kingsford charcoal advertising to Needham, Harper & Steers/USA, Chicago, succeeding Ketchum Advertising, San Francisco. In addition, Clorox shifted its Litter Green cat box filler account, also previously at Ketchum, to Young & Rubicam, San Francisco. Sources say that before the split the company's relationship with Ketchum had been deteriorating for years.

Earlier, Young & Rubicam, San Francisco, was appointed to handle the Olympic paint & stain division previously at Kraft Smith, Seattle. Kraft Smith had handled Olympic before Clorox takeover of the Bellevue, Wash-based paint and stain company in 1981.

Clorox also reassigned its food service products division, shifting its account from Marx/David, San Francisco, to Foote, Cone & Belding/-Honig, San Francisco. Marx/David closed its San Francisco office as a result of the account loss.

Over-all, Clorox reduced its advertising expenditures slightly during the year, primarily through decreases in spot and network tv spending. The company did increase its outlays in newspapers, magazines and outdoor.

Coca-Cola Co., Atlanta, the 20th largest national advertiser, boosted its ad spending to an estimated $255.3 million in 1982, an increase of 29.1% from the previous year.

Net sales for the company were up 6.1% to $6.2 billion, while net income was up 6.3% to $512.2 million.

Although Coca-Cola purchased a theatrical hat (by buying Columbia Pictures Industries in June, 1982) and found it a remarkably good fit, its main order of business continues to be in soft drinks.

Soft drinks, accounting for 72% of all sales and 85% of income at Coca-Cola in 1982, decreased 3.6% in sales to $4.52 billion and increased 11% in earnings to $893.2 million for the year.

Net sales of the nonsoft-drink products, including the food and wine division, were $1.3 billion, up slightly from $1.2 billion from 1981. Entertainment, Coca-Cola's other sector, had revenues of $457 million in 1982, its first year under the Coca-Cola banner.

The most significant development in 1982 was its entry into the entertainment arena with the purchase of Columbia Pictures Industries for approximately $692 million.

It was chairman Roberto C. Goizueta's first major acquisition, and there were mixed reactions from industry analysts. Mr. Goizueta, however, had his eye on the passive leisure time industry in the U.S., estimated to be worth around $80 billion. And, subsequently, hesitations were dispelled as Columbia came out with such winners as "Tootsie," "Gandhi" and "The Toy," all Christmas releases whose combined box office revenues set a new Columbia record for a single week.

Another significant development was the introduction of Diet Coke, the first time another Coke beverage has carried the Coke name since John S. Pemberton founded the company in 1886. The new product was promoted with a hefty ad budget of some $50 million.

The introduction of Diet Coke also has generated talk that the new low-calorie drink would cannibalize Tab, Coca-Cola's sugar-free cola. The word is still out on that, although Coke claims the positioning and markets for the two products are different.

Another major 1982 development was the new advertising for Coke. The "Coke is it!" campaign, introduced in February, is, says the company "the most successful advertising campaign ever developed for Coca-Cola." Measured media advertiser figures show spending for Coke in 1982 was up 5%, from $38.3 million to $40 million, mostly in spot and network tv.

By the end of the year, according to Manny Goldman, beverage analyst with Montgomery Securities in San Francisco, Coke's domestic market share was 25.6%, slightly up from the year before, and Pepsi's was 19.1%, a slight drop. Coca-Cola's soft-drink brands' market share as a whole was up to 37.3% compared with PepsiCo's 26.1%. Tab continues to hold No. 1 position in diet products worldwide, and No. 5 on the Beverage Industry roster of soft drinks in the U.S. with a 3.8% market share. Diet Pepsi holds a 2.9% share on the chart. Ad spending for Tab increased 20%, to $18 million in 1982, mostly in network and spot tv.

More recently, this August, Coca-Cola announced its intention of using the recently approved artificial sweetener aspartame in its diet soft drinks. By the fall, there are indications that both diet Coke and Tab will be on sale featuring the new sweetener, popular because of its lack of aftertaste.

Last year, Sprite, Coca-Cola's lemon-lime product, slipped past PepsiCo's Mountain Dew to regain its No. 6 position on the Beverage Industry list. Ad spending for Sprite was $12.9 million, slightly up from the year before.

Although the company indicated that Ramblin' Root Beer and Mello Yello made "impressive gains," ad spending for both dropped from 1981. Ramblin' got $889,000, less 20%, and Mello Yello got $1.9 million, down 30% from year-earlier figures.

Ad spending for sugar-free Fresca was $624,000, off 83% from 1981, and the third year in a row ad support has plummeted.

After the soft-drink category, citrus is the company's biggest money-maker. Coca-Cola is the largest producer and marketer of citrus in the world. Despite the January freeze that damaged the Florida citrus crop, last year was the best in the 15-year history of the division, included in the company's Food and Wine Group. The division includes citrus and fruit juices sold under the Minute Maid, Snow Crop, Five Alive and Hi-C labels and coffee and tea under the Maryland Club and Butter-Nut labels.

Over-all unit sales for the frozen products were up 7% and chilled products 3%. Ad spending for Minute Maid products was down 12%, to $14 million. New products in 1982 included frozen concentrate orange juice with more pulp and testing of reduced acid orange juice, introduced nationally this January.

According to the company, Minute Maid lemonade was the market leader within its category. Ad spending for the product was up 43% to $706,000. Snow Crop Five Alive, introduced nationally in 1979, remains the No. 2 seller in frozen products, after Minute Maid frozen concentrate orange juice. Ad spending was way down, however, to $2.9 million from $8.2 million in 1981.

Ad spending for the Hi-C products decreased 24%, to $2.5 million in 1982. To boost sales, the company began this January to package Hi-C in aseptic boxes.

Ronco Foods Co., a Memphis, Tenn.-based marketer of high-quality pasta products, was acquired last year, becoming Coca-Cola's first venture into marketing of solid foods.

The Wine Spectrum put in another excellent performance for the company, with a 17% increase in wine gallon sales despite stagnation in U.S. wine sales. Coca-Cola's Taylor California Cellars is the fastest-growing major brand in the history with a 30% increase in sales in 1982. This helped push Wine Spectrum a notch to No. 3 in volume production behind No. 2, United Vintners (Heublein) and No. 1, E&J Gallo.

Other developments in 1982 included the national introduction of light wines, and, more recently, the entry into the economy wine market with Vivante, a significant move that took the Wine Spectrum out of its area of concentration—the premium wine market.

Additional plans this year include the national entry of Taylor California Cellars Brut, Extra Dry and Pink Champagne.

Although Columbia Pictures Industries accounted for only 7% of total revenues for Coca-Cola, several feathers were stuck in this new hat over the past year. One, "Gandhi," cleaned up at the Academy Awards, winning eight—including best actor, best director and best picture, and "Tootsie" cleaned up at the box office. To date, "Tootsie" is Columbia Pictures' biggest grossing domestic release.

Other developments at Columbia include the November, 1982, formation of Tri-Star Pictures with Home Box Office and CBS, its successful entry into the videoarcade game market with a Mylstar product called "Q*bert," and its additional joint venture with RCA to distribute videocassettes and discs domestically.

THEY NEED IT

Hey Pat! Sorry to bother you at home, but I've been going over our media schedule and there's something we need to consider. ENDLESS VACATION.

Right, the magazine that goes to time-share owners.

It's been re-designed and it's REALLY classy now. Just the right image and the circulation is up 178% to 300,000 paid at a LOWER CPM than Travel & Leisure, Travel Holiday or those other books.

I know. That's why I called. A 4 C page in ENDLESS VACATION is less than $6,000.

No, I'm not kidding! $6,000!

Demographics? Great target audience! Median household income of $37,500. 69-and-a-half percent managerial, professional. Almost all are married with kids. 76% college educated. Homeowners. They spend an average of $1,800 on vacations alone!

ENDLESS VACATION. You bet. That's just what we both need.

Isn't ENDLESS VACATION what you need too?

Colgate-Palmolive Co., New York, the nation's 18th largest advertiser, increased advertising spending to $268 million in 1982, a jump of 3% from $260 million in 1981. The increase in advertising at the company, which revamped top management in early 1983, came on the strength of national and international brand expansion and new products.

Sales in 1982 were $4.89 billion, down 7% from the previous year (and a drop from 1980 levels, as well). Earnings were also down during the year, dropping 6% from 1981 to $196.9 million.

Standard & Poor's reported that Colgate, as with many companies with extensive overseas interests, was "penalized by the decline in the value of foreign currencies against the U.S. dollar." Excluding the adverse effects of foreign currency exchange rates, sales would have increased by 9%. S&P reported that foreign business accounted for 58% of Colgate's 1982 sales and 57% of profits.

In the U.S., Colgate reported a 6% volume drop in its household and personal care sector and a drop in its food sector; hospital products volume increased by nearly 2%. The company's specialty consumer sector recorded an 8% gain.

Early this year, Reuben Mark, 44, was named president and chief operating officer with responsibility for worldwide operations. William Powell, 45, became senior executive vp and chief development officer. Mr. Powell directs strategic planning, business development planning, research, manufacturing, engineering, export operations and special markets.

Keith Crane, 61, who was president, assumed the newly created post of chairman and chief executive officer. Mr. Crane, who is responsible for major corporate policy issues, had assumed leadership of Colgate in 1979 and is credited with redirecting corporate strategy from sports/apparel businesses toward the company's traditional base—personal care and household products.

Executive vp Roderick Turner assumed more operational duties, and William Shanahan, J. Dale Sherratt and John Watkins, who had been group vps, became members of Colgate's operating committee. Messrs. Shanahan, Sherratt, Watkins and senior vp Silas Ford also were named corporate officers.

"This is a key watershed period for them," said Jack Salzman, an industry analyst at Smith Barney Harris Upham & Co. "Over the next 12 to 18 months, it is 'put up or shut up.' "

Mr. Salzman said Colgate realigned management, increased marketing expenditure, put its balance sheet in order and now has plenty of cash. "They're ready to do something exciting—and if this changed management cannot come up with an impressive products effort, they may never," he said.

Standard & Poor's reported that household and personal care products accounted for 71% of sales and 55% of profits; food, 10% of sales and 13% of profits, and specialty consumer products, 4% of sales and 11% of profits in 1982.

Last year, Colgate introduced 52 new products in 26 countries; 153 products were revitalized or relaunched in 41 countries. Colgate also overhauled its management "along the lines of similarity of market served, as opposed to strict geographical areas," the company said. Also, former "general management personnel" from overseas operations were reassigned to the business development group.

A large chunk of the company's advertising goes to support its toothpaste brands. Colgate, with a share of about 21% in cases, is No. 2 in the market. Though Procter & Gamble and its Crest continue to hold a commanding lead in the market (38% share), Colgate has managed to gain a slightly larger increment for itself.

In 1982, Colgate spent $32.4 million in measured media last year to advertise its toothpaste brands, which comprise Colgate, Colgate winterfresh gel and Ultra Brite, compared with $30.2 million in 1981. Of the total, the overwhelming bulk, $25.9 million, went to support the gel, part of an active market segment in the past few years. Ultra Brite, which has been losing its share of the market, saw its support drop to $4.5 million, down from $4.8 million in 1981.

Another toothcare product, Fluorigard Dental Rinse, got $1.1 million in ad backing, up from less than $500,000 the previous year and still below the $3.5 million three years previous.

Among its laundry detergent products, Colgate beefed up ad support for Fresh Start and developed what it called "major campaigns" for Fab. Fresh Start, a concentrated detergent with a market share just under 3% in cases, received $16.7 million in measured media spending, up from $14.3 million in 1981. Fab, holding a market share just over 3% in cases, received $1.4 million for its product, which now has a fabric softener in it.

Ajax laundry detergent received a new formula and package, as did Dynamo, a liquid laundry detergent with a 2% market share. Dynamo's reformulation was supported by a $5.8 million spot television campaign, up from $4.3 million in 1981. Cold Power powder detergent maintained a 1% share of market.

In the dishwashing detergent category, Madge the Manicurist (Jan Miner) continued as spokeswoman for Palmolive liquid. The brand, holding an 11.8% market share, received $10.7 million in measured media support in 1982, up from $8.2 million the previous year.

Another dishwashing liquid, Ajax, with a 3.5% market share, also received increased ad support in 1982—$4.4 million, up from $1.6 million the previous year. Dermassage dishwashing liquid with 2% share of market received minimal support of $1.1 million.

In the toilet soap category, Colgate supported its Irish Spring with $7.5 million in advertising, up from $6.8 million in 1981. The deodorant soap holds a 4% share of the market.

Among other products, Colgate made Curad bandages more flexible and supported them with a $5.9 million magazine ad campaign, up from the $2 million allocated in 1981.

Colgate reported a 17% increase in spending for research and development and a 30% increase in capital expenditure. To ensure proper product quality, Colgate said it is sending task forces to manufacturing plants throughout the world to "implement improved formulas," emphasizing dentifrices and toilet soaps.

Also during the year, Colgate sold Joseph Terry & Sons to United Biscuits Ltd. for a reported $46 million.

Meanwhile, Colgate said its sales force late last year began preparations for "the major reintroductions" of "four important core products": Dynamo Action Plus, lemon-scented Ajax all-purpose cleaner, thick lather Colgate shave cream and Curad flexible bandages.

Also, the company claimed its Ajax all-purpose cleaner was successfully relaunched in its overseas market. The product got improved formulation, modernized packaging and added advertising support.

*Company estimate for fiscal 1983 ended June 30, 1983
Fiscal year ended July 3, 1982

Consolidated Foods Corp., Chicago, the nation's 34th largest national advertiser, spent an estimated $178 million on advertising in 1982, a 7% increase over the previous year.

Sales for fiscal 1983, ended July 3, rose 10% to $6.6 billion. Earnings rose 9% to $171 million.

Consolidated, which began in 1941 as a small food wholesaler and now ranks among the top package goods companies as a result of diversification, continued to add new companies under its growing corporate umbrella when in January of this year it acquired Sav-A-Stop, Jacksonville, Fla., for an estimated $72 million. Sav-A-Stop is the nation's leading service merchandising distributor of health and beauty aids, housewares and other nonfood merchandise. The increased distribution capabilities represented by the addition of Sav-A-Stop augments those of the direct store delivery system Consolidated organized for distribution of its L'eggs hosiery lines.

In other acquisitions, Consolidated agreed in March, 1982, to acquire C&C Cola, Elmwood Park, N.J., from ITT Corp., making it a separate division of its Shasta Beverages unit. Streator, Ill.-based Illinois Fruit & Produce in April was added to the PYA/-Monarch foodservice distributor group, strengthening its Midwest presence.

Among Consolidated's various holdings, the Hanes group has become one of the core businesses. Its revenues during the fiscal year ended July 3, 1982, of $1.017 billion ranked third among all company divisions (behind the beverages and foodservice groups), but its pretax income of $74 million represented, for the first time, the largest contribution.

L'eggs Products is the group's most important business, contributing about one-third of the Hanes group's sales. It holds a 30% share in value of the $1.9 billion hosiery market, the company estimates.

Consolidated has responded by giving its L'eggs products the heaviest ad support among all its products—$19.6 million in measured media supporting the basic L'eggs pantyhose, with another $4 million backing assorted line extensions.

The Hanes hosiery brand, which dominates the department and specialty store segment of the market, also has been segmenting its product line. A mid-price Hanes Too! line was added in 1981 (1982 measured media support was $637,000). The Underalls line ($3.5 million in 1982 measured media), offering all-in-one panty and hose, expanded to include Slenderalls ($1.7 million in measured media) and Winteralls ($864,000 in measured media). The company debuted an eight-color line of Coloralls this summer.

Another new Hanes knitwear line, Showtoons (boys underwear featuring several popular cartoon characters), also was launched this year.

Hanes knitwear was the only unit advertising on cable tv in 1982. The company estimates cable expenditures at $88,000.

Consolidated attributes increased sales for its Bali undergarment line to the introduction of the Bali Boutique, a display rack system featuring product pictures on reclosable packages making it easier for women to select the proper size and fit. Bali, the No. 2 brand in the brassiere market, drew ad support of $3.9 million ($2.5 million in 1981), with 80% directed at tv.

The L'erin cosmetics line continued to be the Hanes group's troubled performer in 1982. Following aftertax losses in 1981 of $13 million, and continued (although reportedly lower) losses in 1982, the company sold the unit to Andrea Products Corp., New York, in August, for an undisclosed amount.

Criticism that L'erin lacked sharp focus (the mid-price product is targeted to women 18 to 39) seems valid, given its poor returns. Another criticism has been that Consolidated had failed to adequately promote the L'erin line. Measured media spending in 1982 for the cosmetics was $4.8 million. Higher-price brands, including Cover Girl and Maybelline, spent more than five times that figure.

Results in Consolidated's beverages group, meanwhile, have been mixed. Earnings contributions for the group slid 34% in fiscal 1982. Douwe Egberts, the Netherlands' largest coffee concern, saw its share of the Dutch market dip 5%. The company cited heavy advertising and marketing expenses, necessitated by increased competitive pressures, as a major reason for the depressed earnings.

Consolidated's Shasta operations, however, experienced solid growth with case sales of regular and diet Shasta up 5% in fiscal 1982. The brand's revamped advertising, themed "I wanna pop" and featuring a fast-paced, new wave graphic look and stressing taste and variety, helped boost sales and brand awareness. Network tv took measured ad expenditures of $3.4 million, a shift from 1981's emphasis on spot tv ($1.1 million in 1982). Packaging also was redesigned to feature a diagonal "S" logo and brighter colors. Also, with the additions of Citrus Mist and Red Berry, Shasta brought to 39 the number of flavors it offers.

Shasta Free (no-caffeine) cola rolled national in early 1983, and Dr. Diablo, a Dr Pepper-like soft drink, remained in test in Texas, Oklahoma and Louisiana.

The acquisition of C&C Cola gave Shasta penetration in the Northeast and in a product market where it had been weak. The brand, with sales of more than $40 million, drew $1 million in measured media advertising in 1982.

Capri Sun, a juice-based drink sold in single-serve portions in a flexible foil pouch, maintained its dominant market share as it spent $2 million in measured media.

An aggressive, all-out marketing effort was mustered for the company's Kitchens of Sara Lee. The campaign included boosting measured ad spending from $850,000 to $5.1 million in 1982 and rolling out Puddin' in the Middle Cake, New York Style Cheesecake and a reformulated line of coffee cakes for supermarket freezers. Spending homed in on spot and network tv ($4 million) to support the repackaged line of dessert cakes and to take on Entenmann's with comparative ads.

Although Sara Lee holds a 40% market share in the frozen baked sweet goods category, it has been hurt by competition from such fresh baked goods companies as Entenmann's, ownership of which passed from Warner-Lambert Co. to General Foods Corp. in 1982.

Sara Lee also went national in February 1983 with a three-item line of frozen croissants, which established Sara Lee as the first to introduce a frozen entry in a market that could be worth $100 million. Advertising touted the product as "the croissant of croissants."

Also new in 1983 was an eight-item line of Sara Lee superpremium ice cream, tested by Kroger's Pace Dairies subsidiary under agreement with Consolidated. Tv and newspaper couponing supported the test.

Booth Fisheries saw sales drop for its Booth and Fisher Boy consumer brands of frozen fish. Foodservice sales, however, strengthened. In 1982, Booth acquired Pacific Fish, a Seattle-based fish and seafood distributor, but failed later in the year to sell it off to Omaha-based ConAgra.

Sales by Consolidated's meats group, a collection of six meat processors and marketers with primarily regional distribution, increased 14.7% to $1 billion in 1982, with pretax income up 6.3% to $45 million. That gave the company an approximate 6% share of the $16 billion processed-meat market. Measured media support for Kahn's & Co., which accounts for about one-third of the group's sales, dropped from $3.2 million in 1981 to $1.7 million. Hillshire Farm brand support of $6.2 million in 1981 dropped to $3.4 million. Bryan Foods, Gallo Salame and Rudy's Farm all spent less than $1 million.

In December, Consolidated Foods' president-chief operating officer John J. Cardwell resigned citing "differences over policy and management styles." After the resignation, executive vps Robert Elberson and Robert Jaunich became vice-chairman and president, respectively. However, less than a month later, Mr. Jaunich resigned to become president of Osborne Computer Corp., Hayward, Cal. Mr. Elberson then was named president-chief operating officer of Consolidated.

In April, 1983, Thomas D. MacLeod was named to the vacant post of president-chief executive officer of Consolidated's Kitchens of Sara Lee U.S. unit. Mr. MacLeod had held the same title at Pepsi-Cola Canada.

Dart & Kraft, the nation's 31st largest advertiser in 1982, increased ad spending to $199 million, up 12.5% from 1981's $177 million. The company had 1982 net earnings of $350 million, up 0.8% from 1981, on sales of $9.9 billion, down 2.3% from 1981. The sales decline largely reflected the sale in late 1981 of the Thatcher Glass Mfg. Co., which affected U.S. sales, and the sale of Dominion Dairies Ltd. of Canada, which led in part to a 9% drop in Canadian sales. Excluding the effect of the discontinued operations, the company would have had a sales increase of 3% from 1981.

Kraft, the nation's leading cheese marketer, concentrated advertising on specific product lines in the cheese category last year, with emphasis on new-product introductions. Measured spending for Velveeta processed cheese exploded to $14.9 million last year from $4.8 million in 1981, making it Kraft's most heavily advertised food brand during the year. Most of the spending, heavily concentrated in spot tv, supported the national introduction of Velveeta slices, Kraft said.

The company also began a new campaign during the year for Velveeta loaf, intended to combat its consumer image as something less than real cheese. Tv and some print advertising with the theme, "It's all in this little yellow box," shows the various types of cheeses that make up Velveeta.

The company continued its effort to capitalize on the strong Philadelphia Brand cream cheese franchise by introducing nationally both Flavored Soft Philadelphia Brand cream cheese and Light Philly. Altogether, the Philly brand received a 21% increase in measured ad spending, to $9.5 million.

Additionally, the four-item line of Philadelphia Brand cream cheese salad dressings was introduced nationally this spring following successful test marketing. Advertising plays on the Philadelphia name, using the theme, "Get into the thick of it."

Kraft decreased measured ad spending about 11%, to about $8.5 million, on its regular Kraft pourable dressings, which hold an estimated 40% share of the $570 million market. The drop came in spite of continued new-product introduction in the buttermilk dressing line, whose latest addition is Bacon & Buttermilk dressing, now being introduced nationally.

The company continued a strenuous campaign for Kraft mayonnaise, boosting measured ad spending for the product 39% last year, to $8.3 million. Aimed at cutting into the category leadership of CPC International's Hellman's and Best Foods brands, comparative tv commercials and print ads depict two long-time Hellman's users who have "discovered the creaminess of Kraft" and tell their acquaintances about it. "Now you know" is the theme of the advertising. The campaign, however, is said to have had only a small effect on Kraft's market share, which stands at about 20%, and accompanying price reductions have made the product more competitive with private label mayonnaise than with CPC, sources say.

Although measured spending for Miracle Whip salad dressing dropped slightly to about $8.7 million last year, the 1983 budget is likely to be increased, reflecting this year's 50th anniversary promotions, which include a Golden Anniversary Contest and a strong tv, radio and print campaign stressing the indispensability of Miracle Whip on sandwiches.

This spring, Kraft introduced reduced-calories barbecue sauce in regular and hickory-smoke flavors nationally. Couponed newspaper ads with the theme "All the taste you could want," supported the product, which has a third less calories than regular barbecue sauce.

Measured spending for La Creme frozen whipped topping reached $11.7 million in 1982, its first full year of national distribution. The product is being advertised in tv and print as having "the taste of real cream."

Two products, Coffee Velvet flavored coffee creamers and Kraft Salad Bar Toppings, were pulled from their respective test markets earlier this year. The company said each line is now being evaluated.

The retail food group also ended last year's brief venture into the wine business, reportedly because of stock market displeasure with the idea, a legal conflict and licensing problems. The company reportedly spent less than $5 million on the start-up program and had been prepared to spend $7 million the first two years on advertising and promotion. The retail food group sold its inventory but has not yet divested other holdings of the wine unit.

Seeking to expand the estimated 15% of the $600 million spoonable yogurt market that it now holds with its Light n' Lively and Breyer's lines, Kraft's dairy group this spring introduced a new six-pack version of Light n' Lively yogurt. The yogurt is packaged in 5-oz. containers, making it appropriate for snacks or desserts. The product is expected to be marketed in about half the country by the end of this year. The new line is part of the dairy group's emphasis on value-added products and away from commodity items. During the year, Dart & Kraft continued divesting the dairy group's fluid milk operations. The dairy group has also expanded its marketing area slightly west of its traditional East Coast territory.

Breyer's yogurt received about $1.4 million in measured spending last year, while the Light n' Lively brand received about $1.1 million.

The dairy group this year extended its successful Sealtest Polar B'ars ice cream and chocolate chip cookie sandwiches with new ice cream and oatmeal cookie sandwiches dubbed Polar Caps.

The unit also is test-marketing Breakstone's gourmet dips with real sour cream.

Management changes and reorganization in the Kraft retail group marketing department followed the appointment in November of Michael Miles as president of Kraft Inc., succeeding Arthur Woelfle, who became chairman of Kraft and vice-chairman of Dart & Kraft. Mr. Miles had been senior vp-foods and chairman of Kentucky Fried Chicken Worldwide at Heublein.

Speculation that Kraft would move some assignments from J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, to other Kraft agencies remained unfounded at presstime although sources say that later this year, Needham, Harper & Steers/USA probably will take on some Kraft business now at JWT.

Kraft, historically a leader in innovative media use, continued experimenting with cable tv advertising, but has kept its cable budget "supplemental" to its regular advertising expenditure, according to the company.

Among the networks for which it has developed special advertising are WTBS, Cable News Network and the Home Shopping Show.

The company surprised observers last summer when it added MTV: Music Television cable network to its media buys, and then created special 30-second stereo commercials featuring a rock jingle, "Kraft is the beat." The buy contrasted with Kraft's usual target audience of housewives and represented the first time a non-youth-oriented advertiser has created special commercials targeted to MTV's audience.

Dart & Kraft's consumer and commercial products group finished fiscal 1982 with improved profits, up 33% from 1981 on a sales increase of 14% from last year. The improvement largely reflected cost reductions in the Hobart unit, where 11 plants were closed, staff was reduced 16% and more than $65 million eliminated from inventories.

Hobart's major consumer segment, KitchenAid, saw a 15% sales increase for its flagship dishwasher line, which finished the year as the No. 3 marketer in the category, with an estimated 13% of the market, up from 8% last year. KitchenAid mixers hold an estimated 38.5% of the market; its compactors hold about 10% of the market.

Late last year, KitchenAid awarded its estimated $5 million account to N W Ayer, New York, succeeding Griswold-Eshleman, Cleveland.

To help increase awareness of KitchenAid products among younger consumers, Ayer this spring created a new campaign, "KitchenAid. For the way it's made," and tagged it "The KitchenAid." The company's first network tv effort, along with a magazine print and spot tv campaign, support the dishwasher line, emphasizing capacity and durability.

In June, Hobart announced the acquisition of Rangaire Corp.'s Chambers unit, marketer of premium-quality major cooking appliances. Chambers products probably will be marketed under both the KitchenAid and Chambers names. Ayer will handle the cooking appliances marketed under the KitchenAid label.

West Bend Co. this summer entered a new arena as it purchased Total Gym Inc., San Diego-based marketer of exercise equipment. Four models of exercise systems are being marketed now, although new products are expected to be introduced during the year. West Bend is saying the Total Gym line will "capture a significant amount" of its 1984 advertising budget, but adds that West Bend will not foresake its base business in housewares. Young & Rubicam, Chicago, West Bend's agency of record, is handling the Total Gym line.

Duracell Inc., claiming nearly half of the domestic market for alkaline batteries, took a stronger position in the worldwide market in December by acquiring European battery business of British Ever Ready Ltd. for $60 million.

The purchase makes Duracell the largest battery company in Europe while providing a strong growth potential; alkaline battery penetration in Europe is less than 20%. The company also planned to enter the Japanese market, where the penetration of alkaline batteries is about 40%, during the second half of 1983.

To extend the Duracell franchise, the company early this year introduced Durabeam alkaline flashlights and lanterns into the $250 million U.S. market.

Measured ad spending for Duracell increased 28% in calendar 1982, to $20.5 million from 1981's $16 million. Most of the spending was in network tv.

In Dart & Kraft's direct-selling unit, worldwide exchange rates resulted in Tupperware International's 3% profit decline, to $226.3 million, on a 2% sales increase, to $890.1 million. In the U.S., Tupperware reported a 15% increase in profits on a 14% increase in sales.

During the year, Tupperware introduced Modular Mates, five stackable containers in graduated sizes, intended for smaller kitchens and less storage space. Tupperware is said to be working on a new line of microwave-compatible products that could debut this year.

Delta Air Lines, Atlanta, the nation's 94th largest advertiser, increased ad spending 13.6% in 1982, to $49.3 million.

The Atlanta-based airline was known in 1981 as the world's most profitable airline, but the troubled economy and highly charged competition finally torpedoed Delta's profitable standing.

That financial strength and stability had kept the airline from slipping into the red in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1982, although its earnings plunged 86% that year. On sales of $3.62 billion, up 2% from $3.53 billion the year before, Delta earned $20.8 million compared with 1981's seven times greater earnings of $146.5 million.

Delta could not escape the ravages of unprecedented and "capricious" fare discounting, and at the end of fiscal 1983, the airline reported its first net loss in 36 years, $86.7 million.

Because of that, Delta officials announced in August that they had accepted a voluntary salary reduction through June 30, 1984, and also said the airline would launch an aggressive new advertising campaign in the fall.

Delta attributed its losses to competition with American Airlines, Eastern Air Lines and other major carriers, which had stiffened with Braniff International's introduction of Texas Class in November, 1981, and then with Braniff's demise in May, 1982. While major carriers were extending their routes into already competitive markets, regional carriers began to extend routes beyond their traditional markets and develop their own hubs, which reduced connections for major carriers.

In fiscal 1983, 82% of Delta's domestic traffic had flown on discounted fares, compared to 69% in the year before and 60% the year before that.

Delta had announced plans in 1980 to build a hub at Dallas-Fort Worth Airport, second only to its home-base hub of Atlanta. But in the ensuing competitive melee, American Airlines passed Delta with vast expansion of its own D/FW hub. Besieged from all directions and with profits plummeting, Delta charted a more aggressive marketing course.

The airline's 767 service was inaugurated in December, 1982, with service between Atlanta and Tampa, New York (LaGuardia) and Houston and between Houston and New York (LaGuardia). Delta placed four 767 aircraft into service at that time and planned to expand operations with 16 additional 767 aircraft in 1983 and 1984.

Between Nov. 19, 1982, and Jan. 31, 1983, Delta and Polaroid Corp. engaged in a "Fly Delta Free" promotion in which a round-trip ticket was given to anyone buying a Series 600 Polaroid camera in that period, if the purchaser also purchased an identical full-fare coach ticket between Jan. 1 and April 30, 1983.

Delta introduced new flight attendant uniforms designed by Van Lupu in February, 1983, and announced new streamlined service for its first-class compartments and a new Medallion or business-class service, all on Delta's transatlantic L-1011-500 service.

First-class L-1011 cabins were outfitted with larger reclining sleeper sets, and traditional first-class seating was installed in new Medallion compartments. Glass and china service was designated for the new top classes, along with improved wine and menu selections. Lunch and dinner selections were added to Delta's coach service on flights of three hours or more.

Delta introduced three simplified fare structures in early 1983, reducing the total number of fares offered by about 60%.

With the mid-1982 acquisition of Automated Business Applications, Delta was able to expand its computerized reservations and ticketing service, which it marketed to travel agents as DATAS II, a system that displays all airline schedules on an unbiased basis.

The Louisiana World Exposition, set for May 12 to Nov. 11, 1984, named Delta official carrier for the New Orleans World's Fair, in which capacity Delta is developing vacation packages to promote in key cities in addition to general promotional and advertising support leading up to the event.

Delta expanded its routes modestly in 1982 with service between Atlanta and Pittsburgh; Amarillo, Lubbock and Dallas; Oklahoma City, Atlanta and Tulsa, and other nonstop flights between cities it already served.

In addition to the 767 aircraft put into service in 1982, Delta ordered 33 Boeing 737-200 aircraft, which will be delivered to Delta starting in late calendar year 1983. Delta sold five of its older 727-200 aircraft, returned two leased 727-200 aircraft and sold 11 Lockheed L-1011 aircraft.

On June 19, 1983, Delta opened a $90 million flight center at New York's LaGuardia. Described as the "world's most modern airline terminal," Delta's new two-level center has nine aircraft gates, including six designed for new-generation wide-body jets.

Delta Air Lines added cable tv to its media mix in calendar 1983 for the first time with a WTBS superstation buy. Delta's spots appear in the news program that follows Atlanta Braves ball games.

E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Wilmington, Del., the 65th largest national advertiser, reduced its advertising 11.5% to an estimated $92.9 million in 1982.

Sales for the year totaled $33.3 billion in 1982, slightly higher than combined revenues of $33 billion for du Pont and Conoco in 1981. Combined net income of $894 million was 23% below the total of $1.15 million in 1981. Earnings per share for 1982 were $3.75, lower than the $4.88 share in 1981 but about $1.20 per share higher than they would have been had there been no merger of du Pont with Conoco.

During the year, du Pont acquired Solid State Dielectrics to bolster its position as a supplier to the electronics industry, and Ajax Membrane Products, to broaden its line of "Permasep" reverse osmosis membrane desalting products. It also initiated a joint venture with Japan's Sankyo Ltd. to develop and market pharmaceuticals in Japan.

Among the company's divestitures were the sale of the car care products, Torvex ceramic honeycomb and Percogesic over-the-counter analgesic businesses and the Paramount refinery in California.

Excess capacity for products such as textile nylon fiber, finishes and cellophane packaging material was shut down to bring supply more in line with worldwide demand. At the same time Conoco began to withdraw from its minerals business.

The largest portion of du Pont's advertising budget was devoted to general promotion: $3.1 million was spent on Conoco, nearly all in network tv; $4.3 million on du Pont, mostly devoted to network tv.

Big network tv spenders were Silverstone coating, some $2.9 million of its $3.7 million measured media spend going into network tv, and Zerex antifreeze, with $1 million out of its $1.1 million measured spending going to network tv.

By contrast, magazines dominated the $3.1 million spent for Antron fibers ($2.9 million), and the $3.5 million budget for Teflon stain repeller ($3.4 million). Fibers sales for the company decreased 16% to $4.1 billion in 1982, from a pro forma combined total of $4.9 billion in 1981. After-tax operating income of $136 million was 66% below the 1981 total of $400 million.

According to the company, earnings in 1981 reflected charges of $36 million from the phaseout of Dacron polyester industrial yarn for tires and seat belts and the withdrawal from manufacture of Dacron polyester textile yarn in Canada and Europe. Du Pont's 1982 performance reflected a 22% reduction in shipments, offset only partially by a 7% higher average selling price. Fiber sales accounted for 12.3% of total sales as opposed to 15% in 1981.

Petroleum Refining, Marketing and Transportation had the largest revenues as a group—a total of $15.1 billion. The segment contributed $215 million in after-tax income, a 5% improvement from 1981.

Agricultural and Industrial products helped du Pont earn $170 million (down 27%) on sales of $3.8 billion (down 4% on a combined basis). Industrial chemicals have led the decline begun in 1980.

The polymer products division had sales of $3.1 billion, down 8% from the pro forma combined sales of $3.3 billion. Earnings of $78 million reflected a 40% drop from the $130 million in 1981. Brights spots, however, were sales of Surlyn ionomer resin, Permasep permeators and Clysar shrink films.

Clysar sales should increase as the promising markets for tamper-evident packaging, low shrink-force films and citrus overwrap grow.

Over the year, the company made extensive investments in Europe and Japan to expand polymer capacity, principally in Europe and Japan. This is expected to strengthen competitive positions of its growth businesses in local markets as well as make earnings from sales abroad less vulnerable to fluctuations in the dollar.

Sales of Industrial and Consumer Products in 1982 were $2.5 billion, 8% below 1981. The lower figure reflected a 12% lower volume, partly offset by 4% higher average selling prices. After-tax operating income was down nearly 39% to $129 million.

Severe declines in construction, mining and automotive markets have had a significant impact on most of these businesses.

Biomedical product sales increased by 3% in 1982 to $1 billion. However, operating income declined 8% to $130 million. Clinical instruments recorded strong growth in earnings as a result of higher volume, but over-all totals were affected by increased spending in research and marketing. The sale of Percogesic fetched the unit and the company a $7 million gain. The company filed new drug applications with the FDA in 1982 for three oral forms of Nubian analgesic and for use of Nubian, a balanced anesthetic. In addition, it is itself undergoing a major face-lift.

One of du Pont's more successful products in recent years has been the Quallofil pillow. Introduced to retailers in 1981 and to consumers in March, 1982, the pillow is now carried by 90% of retailers of domestic items in the country. Sales of fibers for Quallofil products exceeded the sales forecast by 60% and the revised forecast by 40%. Du Pont expects over-all pillow sales to increase by 8% to 10% in 1983, but forecasts a 60% increase for Quallofil sales.

A new ad program for Quallofil that broke in March, 1983, included rebates and premiums for pillow purchasers, promotions and displays for stores and an expanded print campaign via BBDO. Ads billed Quallofil as the "incredible, huggable, squeezable, scrunchable, plumpable, washable and dryable" pillow.

In 1982 the company funded an expanded r&d program of almost $900 million and still generated cash flow, before dividends and capital expenditures, in excess of $4.5 billion. The company projects r&d expenditures to reach $1 billion in 1983.

Capital spending in 1982 was almost $3.3 billion—about $500 million lower than what was projected at the beginning of the year. Expenditures for 1983 are expected to remain at the 1982 level, with about $2 million being spent for energy resource development and the balance largely concentrated in high technology growth products and process modernizations to reduce costs.

Eastern Air Lines, Miami, the nation's 89th largest advertiser, increased its advertising expenditures to $57.4 million in 1982, up 6% from the previous year.

The Miami-based airline averted the threat of bankruptcy in 1982 when it successfully negotiated with its banks to ease loan conditions that otherwise would have placed the airline in default on part of a $400 million loan.

Like all other major air carriers, Eastern has faced minimal revenue increases and deepening losses in the wake of deep discount fare wars to fill unoccupied seats. The competitive battle to survive has forced airlines to match each other's promotional fares, causing widespread distress and financial strain in the industry.

Eastern estimates that three out of every four people taking advantage of discount offers would not otherwise have flown Eastern. In 1982, 78% of Eastern's passengers traveled on a discounted fare, up from 70% the previous year. The airline carried 35 million revenue passengers in 1982, still more than any other airline in the free world.

In May, 1982, Eastern joined the rush to fill the void left when Braniff International ceased operations and filed a petition for protection under the Federal Bankruptcy Code. The airline leased Braniff's South American routes for $30 million and spent another $11 million for promotion and aircraft conversion. Because of the expansion into South America, Eastern said in its advertising that "the Western Hemisphere is now the Eastern Hemisphere."

In late 1982, Eastern took delivery of its first Boeing 757, becoming the first airline to place the new fuel-efficient aircraft into service. Eastern planned to take delivery on 13 additional 757s in 1983.

General Motors teamed with Eastern to offer a "Buy now and fly" promotion in which a free round-trip ticket for two was offered as incentive to buy a Chevrolet.

The airline continued as official airline of Walt Disney World as Epcot Center was opened on Oct. 1, retaining its leadership among carriers serving Orlando, Fla. Eastern renewed its contract with Walt Disney World for five years. Eastern promoted first class travel in the fall of 1982 when it announced cuts in first-class fares on more than 800 routes, enabling passengers to fly first class for only $10 to $30 more than normal coach fares before Dec. 15.

Eastern continued its use of cable tv in its media mix, sponsoring the Atlanta Braves baseball games aired on WTBS superstation. Eastern reported its total media budget for 1982 as $56 million. Actual worldwide expenditures for advertising and promotion in 1982 totaled $81.1 million, up from 1981's $70.8 million because of numerous promotions and costly fare wars, and costs associated with the new South American routes.

For 1983, Eastern set a marketing strategy designed to return to profitability. Goals for the year included further expansion into South America, further development of Houston as a hub and strengthening of existing hubs at Atlanta and Miami.

Recognizing that deep discounts failed to produce an offsetting volume of traffic, Eastern joined in the industry's gradual fare increases and established a discount structure to offer modest but meaningful requirements while still offering an inducement for people who otherwise would not fly.

Eastman Kodak Co., Rochester, N.Y., the 45th largest advertiser, spent an estimated $143 million on advertising in 1982, a 41% increase over $101 million in 1981.

The large advertising outlay came in spite of only a slight sales increase and a drop in earnings. Worldwide sales of $10.82 billion in 1982 increased by 5% over 1981's total of $10.34 billion. The photographic division, with sales of $8.9 billion, showed an 8% increase over 1981 figures, spurred by the introduction of disc cameras and film and by impressive growth from Ektaprint copier/duplicators. The chemicals division fared less well, dropping 8% in sales to $2.1 billion. Corporate earnings in 1982 decreased 6% to $1.16 billion.

Kodak, however, has not been climbing out of its slump in either of the first two quarters of its new fiscal year. Sales for the first quarter of 1983 dropped 5% to $2.13 billion and net earnings plunged 73% to $49.4 million compared with year-earlier results. A company spokesman blamed the bulk of the loss on a $90 million early-retirement program, all of which was charged to the first quarter.

In the second quarter, sales declined 1% to $2.40 billion and earnings slipped 31.8% to $169.4 million from the year-earlier quarter. The optional retirement and separation program that hurt profits the first quarter reduced second-quarter profits by $87.4 million. The company, however, expects savings for the full-year effected by the program to equal costs.

The results of the two quarters elicited a statement from top Kodak executives that "1983 will be characterized as a year in which Kodak results will bottom at a point from which recovery can begin."

Kodak's line of disc cameras and film dominated headlines out of Rochester during 1983, and they also dominated the advertising budget, as the company began an estimated $40 million campaign to make the world know and understand its successor to the Instamatic.

Initial sales ran ahead of expectations, helping allay some analysts' fears that the disc camera was too expensive. Although the camera's list price ran from $67.95 for the model 4000 to $142.95 for the model 800, discounting brought the actual price down much lower. And this year Kodak introduced a new bottom-of-the-line disc camera for $56.95, just the beginning of what most observers see as steadily falling prices for the camera.

Kodak's monopoly on the film disc market is likely to be short-lived, as the Fuji Photo Film Co. kept up its pressure on the Kodak-dominated film market by announcing plans to introduce its own disc film this year. While analysts had foreseen competition in the film-disc market, few had anticipated such an early entry.

Much of the budget for selling the disc camera will continue going toward the 30- and 60-second prime time tv commercials, which, through a mixture of high-tech features, plus a dose of traditional Kodak family scenes, have asked viewers to "Picture a brand new world." Longtime Kodak spokesman Michael Landon has been shifted to selling the company's color paper so that Kodak can push the disc camera, and its many facets, with straightforward product copy.

Of the approximately $142.8 million Kodak spent on advertising in 1982, a total of $63.2 million, or 44%, went to network television. Another 10%, or $15.2 million, went to magazines; spot tv was the third biggest beneficiary, with 5%, or $5.8 million.

According to Kodak officials, a new line of high-speed film may well surpass the disc series in terms of advertising expenditures. The Kodacolor VR Series, introduced this year, is a series of four new 35mm color-print films designed to surpass the older Kodachrome II series in quality and range of speeds. The VR 1000, with the highest velocity of the four films, is the fastest color film on the market, enabling photographers to use faster shutter speeds to stop action and a greater range of lenses to otherwise increase flexibility. Kodak officials say the VR 1000 offers the same quality grain and sharpness as the company's ASA 400 film. The VR line also features new versions of color film with ASA readings of 100, 200 and 400.

Because film is the most profitable segment of the photography business, it's not surprising Kodak would want to back its new film line with a heavy sales pitch. While Kodak dominates the $1 billion U.S. film industry with an 85% share, Fuji has stepped up its attempt to increase its 7% slice. And in Japan, where the Kodak/Fuji figures are all but reversed, Kodak sees its new line of films as an opportunity to build upon its 15% share of a $500 million film market.

Initial ads for the VR films show a photograph of a bride taken indoors in candlelight without a flash and with the ASA 1000 film.

Although suffering along with other makers of instant cameras in a currently depressed field, Kodak continued to hold on to its 25% share of the market. To increase its market share and compete against Polaroid's new 600 series of high-speed instant cameras, the company introduced four new Kodamatic cameras and a high-velocity instant film. Replacing the old Colorburst line are the Champ, the 960L, the 970L and the 980L. The Champ, at $29.95 the lowest priced, has already become Kodak's biggest-selling instant camera. The 980L, at $114.95, is the top-of-the-line entry and is the first Kodak auto-focus instant camera.

Kodak's new instant film is Kodamatic ASA 320, its fastest instant film yet, although not as fast as Polaroid's 600 ASA film. It retails for $10.95 per 10-exposure pack, compared with $9.95 for a 10-exposure pack of Polaroid film.

Kodak officials are bullish on two other developments in the instant-camera field. First, Kodamatic Trimprint color film became available this summer, enabling snapshooters to peel any print they take from its traditionally bulky backing. Also unveiled was the Instagraphic CRT imaging outfit, a commercial-market system that takes pictures from still images projected on a video or computer screen. This marks Kodak's first departure from the amateur market in instant photography, and company officials say the response to the system has been excellent. The outfit contains an instant camera, a CRT cone, two packs of film and an adapter for 35mm SLR cameras, all for less than $195.

Copiers are the fastest-growing segment of Kodak's business, accounting for about 10% of total sales last year. Sticking to the high-quality, big-volume end of the copier business, which has been so good to the company in past years, Kodak recently introduced the Ektaprint 250 series. The two copiers make two-sided copies automatically and produce 30% more copies per hour than existing Kodak models.

News was gloomier in the Eastman chemicals division, which made up 19% of Kodak's total sales worldwide last year. Sales in the U.S. were only $1.7 billion, down 7% from 1981, and the sales decrease was an even sharper 15% to $418 million outside the U.S. Company officials cited poor economic conditions, oversupply of several major commodities and adverse currency valuations as reasons for the decline.

Esmark Inc., the nation's 32nd largest advertiser in 1982, will undoubtedly move up to the ranks of the top 10 U.S. ad spenders from now on with the recent acquisition of Norton Simon Inc.

Esmark's successful tender offer for NSI in July, valued at about $880 million in cash and preferred stock, will add the New York conglomerate's heavily advertised Hunt-Wesson grocery products, Max Factor cosmetics, Johnnie Walker Scotch and Avis car rental services to Esmark's stable of brand-name packaged foods, consumer goods and industrial products.

It also will roughly double Esmark's revenue base, which last year totaled nearly $3.4 billion, about $13 million more than in the previous year.

Esmark's net earnings, however, surged ahead by 14.7% to $107.6 million with sharp operating profit gains by its International Playtex and Swift & Co. subsidiaries, which offset eroded earnings in the chemicals and high-fidelity product divisions.

Chicago-based Esmark's 1982 advertising expenditure totaled almost $197.8 million, off about 1% from 1981. NSI spent $191 million on advertising last year. Last year was marked by record profits at Playtex and a continuing turnaround at Swift, following the 1981 divestiture of Swift's fresh-meat operations that left the unit with a number of leading brand-name grocery products such as Brown 'N Serve and Sizzlean processed meats, Butterball turkeys and Treasure Cave blue cheese.

Swift's operating profits were up 29% to a record-high $49.5 million on revenues of $1.4 billion, largely because of overhead cuts tied to reduced inventories and a slash in management positions that cut the corporate staff in half. More important, Swift's return on assets reached 13.5%, up from 10% in 1981 and a loss in 1980. That figure is significant because chairman Donald Kelly has set a 15% return-on-assets goal for all Esmark units—a target that Swift, the largest contributor to Esmark's revenues, has been under particular pressure to hit.

o add The Chronicle to your broadcast buy.

Houston cable penetration now stands at 35%. And among adults with household incomes over $35,000, the ones you want to reach most, 47% subscribe to cable.

What you get is a TV picture so hopelessly fragmented, it's virtually impossible to cover Houston with broadcast.

Solution? To increase your reach and frequency, make The Chronicle the primary part of your Houston media plan. As the largest newspaper in the Southwest, Chronicle penetration among adults with household income of $35,000+ is unmatched.

For example, a one week, $25,000 prime time network TV schedule in Houston delivers only 42% of adults living in $35,000+ households.

An equal investment in The Chronicle delivers 65% of these affluent adults*.

Improved results were shown by all four Swift sectors: Processed meats and poultry, dry grocery, cheese and frozen foods and international. One advertising development was the introduction of two-minute infomercials that come across more as mini-cooking lessons than commercials.

Brown 'N Serve sausages posted record sales and earnings, with Swift's share of the sausage market reaching 7.9% in the second quarter of 1983, compared with 6.2% in the same period a year ago.

Brown 'N Serve ad spending totaled more than $5.8 million, according to Leading National Advertisers, including advertising for the first time in southern states—where sausage sales are heavy but very competitive with numerous regional brands. New products included Brown 'N Serve ham links and ham patties, and the company introduced a fast-selling Country Recipe flavor earlier this year.

Swift increased its leadership position in the processed breakfast strip category by adding all-beef Sizzlean to its pork and brown sugar-cured breakfast strip varieties. Not counting the much larger bacon market, Sizzlean had 80% of the breakfast strip market in the second quarter of 1983, up from 77% in the same period a year ago. Sizzlean strips accounted for $4.7 million in measured ad spending.

Peter Pan peanut butter improved on its third-place market share, with measured ad spending of nearly $8.2 million. Market share increased to 13.7% in the April-June period this year, compared with 12.5% in the same three months last year.

The dry grocery sector also added chicken and beef varieties to its Stew Starter line, which met profit objectives along with the original Soup Starter ingredients line, Esmark said.

Swift has been retrenching on its turkey business, which historically has had a dominant 24% share of the branded turkey market, with tighter inventory and reduced production. However, market share in the fourth quarter last year (which accounts for some 70% of the year's turkey sales) was up to 22.9% from 21.7% in the previous year, even though industrywide turkey sales were off 10%, said Bruce Gooden, director-marketing for dry grocery and the Butterball line.

Esmark said the roughly $38 million drop in Swift's revenues last year were "mainly" because of lower turkey sales. Butterball was supported by about $2.1 million in measured advertising, versus about $3.6 million in the previous year. The poultry group saw the introduction last year of several new products, including a Butterball boneless turkey roast and four new frozen specialties in the International Entree line.

International Playtex remained the most profitable holding in Esmark's portfolio, with earnings at an all-time high of $100.6 million, a 19% gain on record sales of $783.8 million. Esmark said all Playtex product areas showed gains, particularly family products (led by Jhirmack haircare products) and Danskin, maker of leotards and other action knitwear. Measured advertising for various Danskin products totaled more than $3.1 million, including about $1.6 million for multiproduct advertising, mostly network tv. Also, Esmark spent $500,000 to sponsor a "Magic of Dance" special featuring Dame Margot Fonteyn, tied in with Danskin's 100th anniversary.

Playtex spent a measured $12.2 million to advertise bras, mostly for network tv, and another $1.9 million for bras and girdles. Playtex bras had a 21% market share in 1982 and girdles had a 24.1% market share. The intimate apparel division spent $27 million on advertising in 1982, up from $26 million in the previous year. Last year marked the national rollout of Danskin bras and panties.

Another large advertising outlay was for tampons—$6.7 million in measured spending.

Jhirmack haircare products saw a one-third sales growth and a two-thirds earnings growth last year, Playtex said. Haircare products were supported by $3.6 million in measured ad spending, plus $1.3 million for Jhirmack conditioners, $1 million for Jhirmack shampoo and $2.2 million for a new hairspray line that was introduced nationally last year. Esmark acquired Jhirmack last year for $28.4 million.

Total advertising and promotion spending for the family products division was more than $53 million in 1982, of which $19 million was for advertising. The Pennaco hosiery division of Playtex also reported record sales and earnings, with its Round-the-Clock/Givenchy line holding a second-place market share in department and specialty stores.

The hosiery unit plans an aggressive ad spending campaign in 1983, with spending expected to be up 113% across both print and tv, Playtex said.

In Esmark's Eschem division, improved earnings and return on assets were reported for STP Corp. after several years of lackluster results. Ad spending for STP declined slightly in 1982 as targeted promotion efforts were expanded, with a total of about $3.1 million in measured ad spending for STP's line of car-care products, including market-leader STP oil treatment.

Ford Motor Co., Dearborn, Mich., the 12th largest national advertiser, spent an estimated $313.4 million in advertising in 1982, an increase of 9% over $286.6 million in 1981.

Declining vehicle sales in North America continued to plague Ford, though an improving profits picture in Europe helped to temper conditions. The company lost $1.1 billion in the U.S. and $153 million in Canada. Outside North America it earned $613 million, up 58% from the year before.

Worldwide dollar sales sank by 2.9% to $37.1 billion on sales of 4.3 million units, down 2.3% from the year before. Outside the U.S. and Canada, unit sales rose slightly.

The 1982 losses continued a steady, if slow, improvement in earnings for Ford since 1980's $1.5 billion loss.

Ford managed to increase its car market share slightly in the U.S., reversing a spiral that brought the company to a low of 16.6% of the market last year, down from close to 25% in years past. The share for 1982 inched up to 16.9%, but it came in a severely depressed market.

Light-duty truck share also fell for Ford, which lost its truck sales lead to Chevrolet. Ford got 30% of the truck market, down from 31.4%.

Over-all, Ford sold 2,074,003 vehicles in the U.S. in 1982, down slightly from 2,101,822 the year before. Escort continued to lead the industry as the best-selling car in the U.S.

Ford's measured ad spending increased to $288.3 million from $264.2 million in 1981. Broadcast tv again got the biggest chunk, $151.1 million, up sharply from last year's $113.9 million. Ford's slight rise in product ad spending in 1982 was reflected in a similar rise in market share for the company and a flat sales rate, an improvement on the previous year's decline. Ford division sales fell to 925,490 in 1982 from 977,220 the year before.

Sales improved somewhat among Ford trucks, but not enough to keep the division ahead of Chevrolet for the top-selling truck title.

in recent memory, Ford turned to upbeat themes for its cars in the introductory period of fall, 1982. "Look out world, here comes Ford," was sung on radio and tv as a theme for the division's entire line.

Escort, EXP, Mustang and Granada wagon got tv attention while other lines were relegated to radio and print. J. Walter Thompson USA also placed spots on cable.

Poor sales soon drew Ford into a rebate program, competing with a GM special interest rate, Chrysler price cuts and AMC rebates.

By winter, the rebate offer on Escort had gained a free maintenance offer: "The closest thing to cost-free driving." That was tied to a 5% rebate instead of the straight-ahead $400. By February, Ford had to add rebate offers on more small cars and trucks of $750 and a whopping $2,000 on the Continental to keep up with similar GM offers.

Ford used actor Telly Savalas to tout a 24-month, 24,000-mile warranty offer tacked on to the 5% rebates in April. But Ford was looking to get off the rebate treadmill for the 1983 model year, said Robert Gillooly, national ad manager.

Though Ford managed to avoid rebates and special offers on its new models through the fall, it had to borrow a Chrysler technique—freezing prices at the previous year's level—in order to do so. The price freeze in turn made leftover 1982 models less attractive to buyers so Ford stuck special interest rate offers on them, offering 11.9% financing.

Another umbrella popped over the 1983 model in the fall: "Have you driven a Ford . . . lately?" Ford wanted to point to improved quality statistics and the new models (there was really only one—the new LTD—in the fall) without implying the owners of older Fords had missed the boat.

As the only new model, the LTD gained the most ad attention with the theme line, "Have you driven the total car?" Mustang was "One hot piece of American steel." Telly Savalas was back to talk about quality in a separate Escort spot.

Low gas prices kept Ford's big cars moving, which was good for profits but bad for the company's Corporate Average Fuel Economy (CAFE) numbers.

The reskinned Thunderbird, introduced in February, filled a weak spot in the lineup, the specialty coupe. The aerodynamic T-bird got a silent beauty-shot spot well before its introductory date on the Super Bowl telecast. The sporty turbo-coupe Thunderbird, introduced six weeks after the regular version, used ex-racer Jackie Stewart as spokesman.

Ads for downsized Bronco II began running about the same time as the T-bird's. The theme for the Bronco II was, "It's a brand new kick." Ford targeted suburban women buyers in addition to more traditional four-wheel drive users.

As the prime rate began to fall, so did the figures in special interest rate incentives offered by the car companies. Ford followed GM's lead again in April and offered 9.9% financing on Escort, EXP and Ranger. The rates were soon extended through May as small-car sales continued to be relatively soft.

Looking to the 1984 model year intro, Ford executives noted that slow-selling EXP would get a turbocharger for more power and Tempo, just introduced, would also get sportier handling and more power optional.

The introductory theme for the Tempo was "Pick up the Tempo of your life." Ads broke in mid-May. Tv spots started and ended with a shot of the Tempo circling the "o" in a giant sign of its name.

Continental got a tv spot in the "new-wave" style that the Lincoln-Mercury division had helped start the year before. A diamond necklace was lifted off a glamorous neck and tossed into the Continental logo over the traditional spare tire hump on the truck. A voiceover cooed: "The approach, clearly you. The discovery, unexpected. A new Continental . . . the most unconventional Continental in 40 years."

The new four-door Lynx got substantial support. The short headline read, "Missing Lynx." Other heads read, "Handle [illegible]h flair" for LN7, "The great escape" for Capri, "Pleasure cruise" for Marquis and "Fashion shows" for Mark VI. Capri also got a Screenvision 90-second spot for theaters with a "Raiders of the Lost Ark" feel. In the fall, two-thirds of the budget went to tv, the rest to magazines.

The new demand for big cars helped L-M through the fall and winter. The division put extra support behind the full-size Marquis in December.

L-M tied into the Ford car warranty program in late spring with a 24-month, 24,000-mile coverage on most of its cars. It gave the programs its own twist, putting a three-year, 36,000-mile warranty on Lincolns. That was topped off with a 5% rebate.

For the '83 model year, Lincoln was advertised separately from Mercury. Mercury cars continued to get punchy headlines, "Technical knockout" for Lynx, "Accelerate your pulse" for LN7 and "Lands of Ahhhs" for the new Marquis. The same media mix (70% tv, 30% magazine) continued.

Lincoln got away from the "new-wave" look and cute headlines. Continental got a long headline: "The most responsive Continental ever engineered, the finest riding Continental ever built." By the winter, Mercury cars also were getting less "new wave" in their ads. Young & Rubicam, L-M's agency, had begun to tag ads: "Mercury. The substance shows."

Copy for the Topaz took an unusual turn for a car ad, touting safety features. Many corporate image campaigns talk about safety, but the subject doesn't pop up much in ads for individual cars.

Lincoln marketers were looking forward to the fall '84 model year introductory period when they would bring out the Mark VII. A replacement for the boxy, Town Car look-alike Mark VI, the Mark VII returned the Mark line to its original market segment, two-door luxury.

Ford corporate advertising started working on the company's quality image with a campaign from Wells, Rich, Greene. "Quality is Job 1" was the theme for ads and commercials that featured Ford factory workers.

Ford split corporate advertising between Young & Rubicam and Wells, Rich, Greene in the spring, handing the "Quality" campaign to Y&R and giving WRG the "There's a Ford in America's future." A third campaign, "Ford has it. Now," was added in the fall. It starred Jackie Stewart, who talked about driveability and general quality in Ford's new products.

It all ended up back at Wells, Rich, Greene after an ad assignment shuffle. Y&R lost the Q1 and JWT lost the Jackie Stewart campaign. The money from those efforts returned to the agencies as added funds for divisional advertising. Jackie Stewart was kept on as Ford division spokesman.

Lee Miskowski, general marketing manager at Ford division, left to become service programs manager at Ford parts and service division in the spring of 1983. Thomas J. Wagner stepped into Mr. Miskowski's old spot from sales manager at Ford's central region.

Ford parts and service started cranking up its ad effort earlier in the spring of 1983 with a Motorcraft campaign. "Motorcraft exceeds the need," was the theme in futuristic tv spots and magazine ads from Y&R. The campaign was scheduled to get an annual budget of $15 million to $20 million.

Separately, the parts and service division began running a campaign in May for a "lifetime service guarantee." Under the program, consumers would pay for a repair once and the dealership would repair it free thereafter.

In the spring of 1982, Ford Tractor built on the Escort "world car" campaign in ads for the new Series 10 line of tractors. The theme was "Built to take on the world." Tractor sales worldwide continued to fall because of a depressed agricultural market. Ford sold 73,163 tractors in 1982, down from a poor 89,274, the year before.

Ford Motor Land Development Corp. first tried to sell and then reorganized its interest in the ailing Renaissance Center in Detroit. spent an estimated $42.9 million on advertising in 1982, a 19% increase from 1981 expenditures of $36.0 million.

This is the first time since our 1978 report that the nation's largest wine producer has been in the ranks of the 100 leading advertisers. In that year, Gallo spent an estimated $22 million.

The privately-held company does not release sales and earnings figures, nor does it discuss market shares. But wine industry sources estimated sales, based on an approximate 4.5% increase in shipments during 1982 over the previous year, at about $620 million. The company still has a virtual lock on the U.S. wine market despite increased competition from Coca-Cola Co.'s Wine Spectrum. Gallo accounted for 26.7% of total U.S. wine shipments in 1982, its highest share since 1977, when it held 27.5% of the market. Gallo wines hold a 38.2% share of the big California market.

Gallo's shipment gain, though less than its 7.5% increase in 1981, was in line with its 4% average annual compound growth rate from 1975 to 1980, though a drop from its 7.5% increase in 1981. The winery shipped about 137.3 million gals. of wine in 1982, vs 131.4 million gals. the previous year. Gallo achieved these gains despite a virtually flat U.S. wine market last year, a difficult economic climate that fostered intense price competition among both foreign and domestic wine producers and major advertising investments by competitors.

Much of Gallo's increase occurred in the fourth quarter of 1982, reversing an unusual 0.3% drop in shipments during the first half of the year. Perhaps spurred by these early results, the family-owned company petitioned the Federal Trade Commission to rescind a 1976 order barring it from imposing exclusive dealerships and territorial arrangements with wholesalers. In its petition, Gallo maintained the wine industry had evolved into a more competitive marketing environment bearing little resemblance to what existed in 1976, when the FTC came down on the winery for what it termed "exclusionary market policies" with its distributors. In spring, 1983, the restriction was removed. Meanwhile, Gallo recouped its losses with a big surge in wine shipments during the latter part of the year. The bigger news, however, came in the first part of 1983. Gallo shipments were up 13% during the first four months, an increase of about 5.4 million gals. The increase occurred in an otherwise almost totally flat California wine market. Said one analyst: "Take Gallo away and the California market looks sick."

Gallo introduced one new product late last year, Andre Brut Champagne, an extension of its Andre line, which already accounts for about one out of every three bottles of sparkling wine consumed in the U.S. The Brut, introduced in San Diego and Modesto, was backed by spot tv featuring wine writer William Kaufman extolling the product's dryness. The wine, priced about $1 higher than the company's leading extra dry brand, is still in test markets.

Shipments of Andre sparkling wines have been growing at almost 10% annually for the past five years and registered a 10.2% increase last year over 1981. Measured spending for Andre, 100% budgeted to television, grew by about 18% in 1982. Most spots featured Gallo's familiar holiday bells jingle. The company continues to challenge Jos. E. Seagram & Sons' Christian Brothers for the No. 1 spot in the brandy business. Gallo, which started producing E&J Brandy in 1976, increased its shipments from 2.2 million gals. in 1981 to 2.7 million gals. last year, an increase of 22%, while CB slipped 21%, from 4.4 million gals. to 3.5 million gals., during that same period. Depletion figures compiled by industry analysts show that Gallo's share of the brandy business grew from 11% in 1981 to 14% last year, while CB's portion fell from 22% to 21%. Figures for the first five months of 1983 show Gallo shipments exceeding Christian Brothers by about 250,000 gals. Analysts suggested that the winery's growing interest in the brandy business stems from the profit potential of the business and the fact that brandy-making uses a lot of grapes—providing a perfect answer for recent surpluses.

Gallo supported E&J brandy with an estimated $3 million advertising effort, more than half budgeted to magazine and the rest to outdoor and newspaper ads conveying the message: "You're only an E&J away from a perfect day." Needham, Harper & Steers, Los Angeles, the agency that created the campaign, took over Gallo's brandy business from Leber Katz Partners in June, 1982, two months after the winery named the Chicago office to handle Andre and premium wines. In October, Ogilvy & Mather, San Francisco, which already handled the company's varietal wines and corporate advertising, took over its premium wines as well. Needham, meanwhile, moved the brandy, champagne and new products business to its Los Angeles office because of "servicing requirements."

Ogilvy, which now handles about $25 million worth of Gallo business, is responsible for the "All the best" theme created to unify the company's advertising. The campaign is credited with winning the agency the premium wine business from Needham. Young & Rubicam handled most of Gallo's wine advertising from 1967 through August, 1981, when it resigned to take on Heublein's United Vintners (now Heublein Wines). At the time, Sid Marshall, head of Y&R's Los Angeles office, said the agency had become increasingly annoyed by Gallo's "interviewing a lot of other agencies while we were doing the work." Following the resignation, Ogilvy; Wells, Rich, Greene; Leber Katz Partners, and McCann all vied for the business over a period of several months. Meanwhile, Ogilvy aired spots for various varietals including several described as "basic awards stories" zeroing in on medals Gallo wines have won in international tastings and the quality of the grapes used. The campaigns for varietals and premium wines have continued the winery's push to create a quality image for its Cellars of Ernest & Julio Gallo and Gallo premium wines.

Gallo's spending on Carlo Rossi wines increased to almost $1 million, (all spot tv), from about $600,000 (two-thirds network) in 1981. A 30-second spot testing in Denver surprised industry experts who thought comparative wine commercials were on the way out. The spots featured Mr. Rossi comparing his lower-cost wines to the premium-price Inglenook chablis and suggesting: "If you can't taste the difference, why pay the difference?"

The battle between Gallo and Atlanta-based Coca-Cola Co. appears to be heating up. Soon after Coke's Wine Spectrum started test marketing Vivante, an economy-price wine competitive with Gallo's Carlo Rossi, the Modesto winery launched Polo Brindisi, a Riunite-like product expected to fill a market niche between the sweeter Italian wines and the more traditional California generic wines. In development for four years, the brand is apparently Gallo's response to the success of lambrusco and other Italian imports in the U.S. marketplace. It is being tested in 20 markets, including Sacramento, Cal., New Orleans, upstate New York, Milwaukee, Phoenix, Maine and Connecticut. A tv campaign in selected markets advises: "Open the Polo, tastes so light 'n' easy. Enjoy both as a cocktail or with meals." Ad spending is estimated at between $1.5 million and $2 million. Most industry watchers won't venture a guess on how well the new entry will do. But said one, "Nine times out of 10, when Gallo introduces something, it has an impact."

Over-all, Gallo increased spending in network tv to $26.4 million, compared with $24.3 in 1981. It more than quadrupled its expenditures in spot tv to $4.4 million from $1 million.

What ~~is~~ Was the best kept secret in direct marketing?

By now you have probably heard of Epsilon, one of the nation's largest independent firms devoted solely to targeted marketing and direct response programs.

Clients like Holiday Inns, Texas Instruments, Emery Worldwide and Pan American World Airways have discovered — and you can too — why Epsilon is no longer the best kept secret in direct marketing.

The Perfect Marriage

You've heard a lot of people pay lip service to the necessary relationship between direct marketing and computer technology. At Epsilon, that relationship has become a perfect marriage.

Segmentation or targeting — whatever you call it, can't be done effectively without a sophisticated marketing information system.

We've got it. And our clients believe it's the best support system available today for the direct marketing professional.

It's got all the "bells and whisties" you'd expect — but we take it one step further. We custom tailor the system for you so it becomes your personal marketing database.

We'll even give you your own personal desk top computer, so you can control data right in your own office.

"That Doesn't Look Like a Computer Letter."

Precisely. It shouldn't look like one. Why have a prospect or customer focus on how a letter is produced, instead of what a letter says?

Epsilon has pioneered "super personalization" — letters that look so personal you want to read them . . . and respond.

We help you develop, create, and produce measurable, highly responsive, top quality direct mail. It's the only kind of direct mail we produce.

Beyond Recency, Frequency, and Amount

For superior market segmentation and targeted messages, you need to go beyond recency, frequency, and amount of purchase.

That's why you might want to use Epsilon's market research services. It's a natural extension of direct marketing. You'll learn key facts about your constituents — lifestyles, beliefs, feelings, expectations, motivations. And you can use this data to target the right message at the right time, to the right person.

Fulfillment With a Difference

Fast, high quality fulfillment is critically important. After all, it doesn't do any good to acquire a customer if you can't service his needs on a long-term basis.

That's why Epsilon provides a premium fulfillment service designed for clients who recognize the value of the customer relationship. High quality fulfillment is an investment that pays off in satisfied, lasting customers.

This unique service is not for everyone. General Electric Co., Fairfield, Conn., the 40th largest advertiser in the U.S., decreased its over-all advertising spending 3% in 1982, to $159 million.

The lingering recession and a drop off in consumer spending forced the company to drastically reduce its individual product advertising and focus instead on multiproduct promotion and general image-building during 1982.

Once again, however, the largest segment of advertising dollars went to its consumer products sector.

Spending levels in 1982 increased from the previous year only for newspaper supplements and outdoor advertising. Advertising in all other mediums declined, and total measured spending was down 32%. Network radio was down the most compared to 1981 and network tv declined the least (down only 3% to $29 million). Spot tv declined 63.4% to $3.2 million, magazines dropped 47% to $10.3 million and newspapers fell 409% to $6.1 million.

Earnings in 1982 rose by 10% to $1.8 billion. Sales, however, declined 3% to $26.5 billion.

General Electric officials were forecasting improved earnings for 1983 based on an upturn in the economy and consumer spending.

First-quarter earnings for 1983 were $425 million, up 13% from the first quarter in 1982, while sales were up 1% to $6.1 billion.

In 1982, GE continued to shift more of its emphasis outside the traditional electrical manufacturing business to fast growing high-technology and service markets. Three-fourths of GE's earnings came from electrical manufacturing in the 1970s compared with just 40% (or $600 million) in 1982. GE's greatest earnings growth has come from such nontraditional businesses as services (providing 21% of the company's earnings in 1982 compared with 14% in 1970), materials (28% earnings last year compared with 8% in 1970) and aircraft engines (9% of 1982 earnings vs. virtually no contribution in 1970).

The shifting emphasis has come about particularly in the past two years. GE has cut 118 deals, whether acquisitions, joint ventures or the creation of new companies, while disposing of 71 businesses that did not fit into its business strategy. These transactions involved $1.5 billion: Roughly $1 billion for acquisitions and $500 million received for dispositions.

The most significant transaction, announced in late January, is the proposed sale for about $2.4 billion of most of GE's holdings in Utah International Inc. to The Broken Hill Proprietary Co., an Australian industrial and natural resources company.

In the consumer products sector, GE's revenues were down from $6.6 billion in 1981 to $5.9 billion in 1982. Net earnings also were down from $292 million in 1981 to $239 million in 1982. A majority of the sector's ad budget in 1982 was used to expand the over-all brand campaign, "We bring good things to life" begun in 1981, focusing on nonconsumer businesses and services, including GE's computer information service, computer-aided design equipment, and CAT scanner equipment.

Richard A. Costello, manager of marketing for consumer products, explained that the company saw the lull caused by the recession as a time to heighten public awareness of GE as a major supplier of nonconsumer products, which account for 70% of the company's business.

In 1982, GE launched the second in its series of "warm feelings" tv commercials, focusing on how to improve home lighting and how to rejuvenate the major appliances in a kitchen. Two of GE's newest consumer-oriented services: The "Quick Fix" systems of do-it-yourself major appliances repair and the 24-hour consumer telephone Answer Center, also were introduced.

New products, which received $1 million or more in spending included the energy-efficient Miser light line and the Dual Wave microwave oven. In 1983, the consumer products sector will maintain its multiproduct and brand campaigns while accelerating its spending on individual products, particularly a large number of new products being introduced this fall. New products, which will receive $1 million or more in ad support, include each of a new line of space-saver kitchen appliances (a drip coffee maker, electric knife and can opener) which will be promoted separately and collectively; GE's new line of telephones (with memory, redial, clock radio and cordless features); several new electronically controlled dishwashers and GE's 22-cu.-ft. refrigerator (which was introduced late last year but will be advertised for the first time this fall).

Lighting sales and earnings were down in 1982. While housewares and audio sales were down, earnings in 1982 increased significantly as benefits of world product programs began to be realized.

Broadcast and cable tv revenues and earnings showed continued growth. Tv sales were flat, and, despite higher unit volume, operations resulted in a loss due to highly competitive conditions and depressed pricing.

GE made drastic reductions in ad spending in 1982 on the following products: Home air conditioning and heating, CB radios, color tv sets, digital clock radios, dishwashers, refrigerator-freezers, room air conditioners, walk-around radio and cassette players and washer/dryers.

GE spent no advertising dollars at all on beauty appliances, coffee makers, irons, stereo systems, microwave ranges, projection tv, radios and clock radios, ranges and microwave ovens and toaster ovens.

It did, however, spend 42% more advertising dollars (or $20,700) in 1982 on automotive products, 151% more (or $8.1 million) on home light bulbs and 137% more (or $2.6 million) on rechargeable battery systems.

GE also spent $2 million on advertising of major appliances in 1982 (up by 542% from 1981), $4.2 million on microwave ovens (down from $9.9 million in 1981), $10 million on multiproduct advertising (down from $21.3 million in 1981), $1.8 million on tv and videotape systems (from virtually nothing in 1981) and $4.6 million on general company promotion (up from $3 million in 1981).

Bart Snider, project manager for corporate marketing, said GE has been attempting to determine how to "do a brand job in advertising for the other 80% of the company." As a result, GE later this year and early in 1984 will launch a new commercial and industrial campaign that will use media outside the narrowly focused trade publications to familiarize a broader range of professionals with GE's other sectors.

The continuing reorganization of its industrial products sector—all components of which have been reassigned to technical systems, services and materials, and power systems sectors of the company—resulted in the movement of industrial products executive vp Louis V. Tomasetti to executive vp and sector executive of the Power Systems sector, replacing Herman R. Hill, who retired after 41 years with GE.

GE Credit Corp., under the direction of Ogilvy & Mather, launched a new $3 million advertising campaign April 1, 1983.

Using mainly business-oriented print and tv placement, the campaign is directed toward high-level executives and promotes the credit corporation as a diverse, one-stop shopping opportunity for business. The campaign slogan is "Creating Money for Business."

Barton Ladd, vp-marketing for GE Credit Corp., said the campaign, which will continue through the first quarter of 1984, has generated 5,000 direct response inquiries to the ads, via coupons and a toll-free telephone number. The success of the campaign has led the company to adopt a more aggressive marketing stance that will involve a follow-up campaign early next year.

General Foods Corp., White Plains, N.Y., the sixth largest national advertiser, reduced its ad spending 11.8% to an estimated $429.1 million in 1982.

The company noted that even though total ad and promotional expenditures were lower in fiscal 1983 ended April 2, the ratio of ad expenditures to net sales was about the same level as the previous year, when sales were 1.1% higher. GF's worldwide drop in revenues to $8.26 billion in fiscal 1983, however, was countered by an increase of 11.3% in earnings to $288.5 million.

A slightly different picture emerged in GF's financial results for the first quarter of fiscal 1983 with the company reporting a 2.9% drop in net earnings to $59.7 million from $61.5 million the first quarter a year ago, and a 3.7% improvement in sales to $2.14 billion from $2.06 billion a year ago.

Late in 1982, GF had to do some fancy footwork to convince industry analysts that it had no intention of leaving the pet foods business, as had been rumored. The company began running a color spread ad in a number of business publications with the headline, "The new breed at Gaines." The copy referred to the heritage of Gaines and how it had been experiencing substantial gains in an industry in the doldrums.

The company, however, did drop one of its ad agencies—Grey Advertising—of the pet division roster. It also cut ad spending from nearly $40 million to about $23 million, concentrating on Gainesburgers and Gravy Train while dropping support of Cycle and Top Choice.

The glamor story for the year was the success of Jell-O Pudding Pops, which reached $100 million in retail sales in its first full year of distribution.

Other successes include aspartame-sweetened Kool-Aid drink mixes and Crystal Light drink mix, also sweetened with aspartame. Both drink mixes greatly exceeded the company's sales expectations.

The year also marked the completion of GF's acquisition of Entenmann's Inc. from Warner-Lambert Co. for $315 million. GF believes it can easily expand Entenmann's products from their present 36% national coverage to 60% using GF's distribution mechanism.

GF announced in January, 1983, it would purchase for less than $10 million two cheese distributors—Otto Roth & Co., Moonachie, N.J., and Peacock Foods, Los Angeles—which complement GF's purchase in 1982 of the cheese operations of Borden Inc., Van Wert, O. Combined sales of these distributorships are estimated at about $75 million.

During fiscal 1983, GF's four product segments turned in mixed performances. Net sales for package grocery products, which generate 40.9% of total sales, increased 1.4% to $3.38 billion.

By contrast, operating earnings increased by 15.4% as a result of the significant turnaround in GF's reconfigured pet foods business, more sharply focused spending on development products in new categories and the inclusion of earnings from Entenmann's.

Volumes of Post brands reached the highest in history. Not surprisingly, the market share for GF cereals increased from 15% in 1981 to 16% in 1982.

The company noted that Raisin Grape-Nuts cereal and Honey Nut Crunch raisin bran further strengthened the important Post brands of Grape-Nuts and Raisin Bran. Smurf-Berry Crunch and Strawberry Honeycomb were also proving to be highly successful as new children's cereal products.

GF supported its cereals with considerable expenditures. Post Fruit & Fibre cereal received $10.9 million in measured media support while Raisin Grape-Nuts received $10.5 million. Together they had 4.1% of the market. GF's best-selling cereal, Raisin Bran, had 2.8% share of the market and received $5.8 million in measured media support.

The pet foods division registered record operating profits in fiscal 1983, compared with a loss the previous year. The division was restructured to reduce operating costs and to focus marketing and product improvement efforts on major brands: Gravy Train, Gainesburgers, Top Choice and Cycle. Later in the year, GF narrowed this down even further to Gravy Train and Gainesburgers.

Gravy Train canned dog food received $8.4 million in measured media support and increased its share of the dry dog food market from 6% in 1981 to 7% in 1982. Gainesburgers received $9.8 million in measured media support and while dollar sales decreased from $73 million in 1981 to $71 million in 1982, market share actually increased, from 26% to 27.5%, because of the sharp drop in sales in the moist dog food category.

Tang instant breakfast drink received $9.9 million in measured media support in fiscal 1983, a drop of nearly $1.4 million from the previous year. Similarly, Kool-Aid unsweetened drink mix, which had received $11.3 million in fiscal 1982, saw a decrease of $6.9 million. By contrast, Kool-Aid presweetened mix experienced an increase in ad support—from $10.8 million to $11.5 million.

GF went national with its aspartame-sweetened Kool-Aid drink mixes, and introduced a new line of drink mixes, Crystal Light. Also sweetened with aspartame, Crystal Light is expected to reach national distribution next year.

Grocery coffee continued to hold a dominant position in the market with net sales of $2.29 billion, contributing 30.8% of total revenues. Regular coffee increased its market share to 34.8% from 34% the year before, while instant brands lost some ground, dropping from 45.9% in fiscal 1982 to 45.7% in fiscal 1983. In the regular segment, Maxwell House Master Blend had the best jump in market share, moving from 5% to 6.9%. GF supported its Master Blend campaign with $19.9 million in measured media spending, 72% of which was allocated to network tv.

Brim, Maxwell House and Sanka together received $58.7 million in measured media spending, mostly network tv. Sanka instant had a 10.5% share of the instant market, Maxwell House a 22.9% share and Brim a 4.3% share. In the regular market, Maxwell House continued to trail Procter & Gamble's Folger's (23.0%) with 19.5% of the market.

GF expects continued growth in the decaffeinated segment and points out that two of its products, Ground Sanka and Ground Brim, are now distributed in nearly 30% of the market.

Another area that showed promise was General Foods International Coffees, which received $12.2 million in measured media support. A new flavor, Cafe Amaretto, has shown success in the market, the company said.

GF's acquisition of Oscar Mayer in 1981 is already paying off, the company said.

The processed meats division, which includes Oscar Mayer, contributed $1.56 billion, or 18.9% of total GF sales, up 14.7% from the previous year's total of $1.36 billion. Oscar Mayer cold cuts received $6.1 million in measured media support, while wieners received $5.8 million.

Foodservice and other businesses contributed $1 billion or 10.1% of GF's total revenues. Fiscal 1983 net sales decreased 8% because of the lower volumes resulting from the depressed economy and absence of sales from divested U.S. and Canadian businesses.

Of the company's $349.3 million in measured media support, the largest share went to network tv—$232.3 million, or 66.5% of total expenditures in the category—but the amount was 2.5% less than the previous year. Spot tv received $70.8 million, down 15.7% from fiscal 1982. Another major spending category included newspapers, but the $29.7 million spent was 20% below that of the previous year.

GF decided in late 1982 that it would cut back its daytime advertising on network tv and accelerate its already active support of alternative media.

According to Broadcast Advertisers Report, GF spent $73.9 million in daytime network tv. The cancelations, it is believed, will amount to between 3% and 8% of this total.

in 1981. Much of that increase was due to the introduction of new products.

The company, for example, made several thrusts in the current children's cereal category battle. Last fall, Strawberry Shortcake cereal, marketed on a single-order basis in selected markets during 1981, was introduced nationally with enormous initial success, capturing about 0.5% of the $3.5 billion ready-to-eat cereal market. But subsequent entries based on popular children's characters—all intended to provide immediate product identity to quickly capture a new generation of youngsters—reportedly have cut Strawberry Shortcake cereal sales in half.

General Mills also moved Pac-Man cereal, based on the videogame character, into national distribution this spring. Introductory ad and promotion spending for Pac-Man cereal was set at $20 million.

General Mills hung on to the No. 2 spot in the ready-to-eat cereal market with about 23% of the market, approximately the same as in 1981.

According to Lehman Bros. Kuhn Loeb, the company's greatest share gain among its cereals came from Strawberry Shortcake, which received about $2.8 million in advertising for calendar 1982. The company also saw a slight share increase for the two-year-old Donutz powdered sugar-coated cereal, which was backed by more than $7.5 million in measured media in calendar 1982, and a minor share increase for Honey Nut Cheerios, whose measured spending reached nearly $7 million, up more than 42% over 1981. Market shares of Trix, Golden Grahams, Crispy Wheats 'n Raisins and Lucky Charms all showed slight share declines.

Ad spending for Cheerios, the No. 2 cereal in the market, jumped 37.7% to $13.4 million, while spending for Buc*Wheats dropped nearly 40% to $3.3 million.

A new campaign for Wheaties, themed "What the big boys eat," broke in June, featuring ball players both playing ball and eating the cereal.

General Mills' Betty Crocker brands held on to second place behind Procter & Gamble's Duncan Hines line in the $752 million dessert mix market. One major effort this year was this spring's national introduction of Betty Crocker Bake-A-Bar chewy granola bar mix, believed to be the first such mix on the market.

Betty Crocker frosting mixes had about 73% of the $58 million two-layer cake frosting mix market at the end of calendar 1982. At the same time, Betty Crocker Creamy Deluxe frosting had about 53% of the $187 million ready-to-spread frosting market. But they both faced increased competition beginning in January from Duncan Hines' new Creamy Frosting, Procter & Gamble's first national entry into the frosting market. General Mills' frosting lines are expected to lose share to the strong Duncan Hines brand name this year, despite growth in the category. The canned frosting received about $3.3 million in measured ad spending during calendar 1982; General Mills has said it plans to spend heavily this year, in part to compete with "the long-awaited entry of Procter & Gamble into the frosting market."

General Mills' interest in capitalizing on the health and nutrition craze spawned several additions to the Nature Valley line. As its near-stranglehold on the granola snack market was challenged by Quaker Oats' introduction of Chewy granola bars, General Mills late last year began a midwestern introduction of Nature Valley Chewy granola bars with a pledge of $17 million in advertising and promotion. The product has not yet rolled out nationally.

Last November, the company jumped into the growing battle for the fruit juice market by entering a five-flavor line of Nature Valley Fruit-Squeeez juices into Texas test markets. The aseptically packed drinks, all blends of several natural juices, are being backed by tv, magazine and newspaper couponing.

The company last fall also put Nuts About Fruit, a four-item line of real fruit and nut bars, in two test markets. The Nature Valley label did not appear on the product.

Concurrent with the introduction of Chewy, General Mills began a national rollout of Fruit Roll-Ups, a four-flavor line of rolled sheets of dried fruit, targeted to children. While marketed under the Betty Crocker brand, with a new "Fruit Corners" logo, rather than the Nature Valley label, General Mills attained retail shelf space for the product in the same "wholesome snack" section of the store. A $17.5 million tv and couponing campaign was scheduled for the Fruit Roll-Ups introduction, which featured a rhyming jingle beginning, "You can peel 'em, you can poke 'em, you can stretch 'em, you can tear 'em."

This summer, the company sold its Chef Saluto pizza unit to a subsidiary of Jeno's Inc., citing "failure to achieve our financial goals" and "better financial prospects" from other food investments.

Only eight months before, the brand had been reformulated and relaunched as Chef Saluto Fresh-Bake pizza, a 16-item line frozen with a partially baked crust and packed with its own baking sheet. Measured spending for the Chef Saluto brand plummeted, according to Leading National Advertisers, from $2.14 million in 1981 to $262,100 during 1982. The company denied the latter figure but would not provide more detailed information.

The sale eliminates General Mills as a potential major force in frozen foods, and leaves it with only one frozen foods unit: Gorton's of Glouster seafood. That company holds the No. 2 place in the category.

Backed by $2.8 million in ad spending—more than double the measured spending for 1981—the Gorton's unit saw a 3% increase in dollar share, to 23% of the $650 million category. Late last year, Gorton's kept in step with market leader Mrs. Paul's and third-place competitor Van de Kamp's by introducing a four-item line of Light Recipe fish sticks and fillets containing more fish and less breading and oil than regular products. The company also entered seven test markets with a three-item line of condensed clam chowders and New England clam stew. Radio and coupon newspaper ads stress thickness.

During 1982, General Mills tested and then, this summer, nationally introduced Yoplait Breakfast Yogurt with wheat grains, fruit chunks and walnuts. The entry followed the earlier national introduction of Yoplait custard-style yogurt. Backed by a 10.5% increase in ad spending, to $4.8 million, in calendar 1982, Yoplait is still in second place behind BSN/Gervais Danone's Dannon.

This spring, General Mills agreed to sell Columbus, Ga.-based Tom's Foods, its snack foods operations, to Rowntree MacIntosh, an English corporation, for $250 million.

General Mills' toy group, with a 9% share of the $5.8 billion U.S. toy market and 6% of the $12.56 billion worldwide toy market, increased advertising nearly 54%, to more than $20 million, for the Parker Bros. unit during 1982. It also increased Kenner Products' advertising by 6% to $23.7 million. The Fundimensions unit received an estimated $1 million in advertising.

Advertising in the Parker Bros. unit primarily supported the introduction of Parker Bros. videogame cartridges, among which the biggest seller was Frogger. James Fifield, executive vp for the toy group, said in September that Parker Bros. would spend more than $15 million to advertise the software line, but in January, the company pledged about $30 million for 1983 spending on new cartridges for a variety of videogame formats, including personal computers. New titles include Strawberry Shortcake, G.I. Joe, Q-Bert and Popeye.

In a decision that could have far-reaching effects on other companies, Parker Bros. lost its nine-year-old court fight to retain its trademark on the Monopoly game. The Supreme Court's refusal to hear the case, brought by the president of a company marketing an Anti-Monopoly game, upheld an appellate court ruling that trademark protection can be extended to a brand only when its "primary significance" is to identify the producer, not the product.

Nonetheless, Parker Bros. believes its game is secure because of copyrights on the product itself.

Kenner's advertising emphasized the Strawberry Shortcake and Star Wars series characters, but the company also was gearing up for this spring's introduction of the toys, games, dolls and books based on the new Care Bears characters, developed jointly with American Greetings' Those Characters from Cleveland unit. Care Bears, being licensed to a variety of children's products marketers, has been touted as a line that could be as big as Strawberry Shortcake, which accumulated sales of more than $125 million for the toy group last year.

During mid-1982, Kenner Products eliminated Sive Associates, Cincinnati, from its roster of ad agencies, moving about $10 million in billings to Grey Advertising and Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York. The reassignment included Play-Doh, Glamour Gals, Discovery Time products and miniature cars. In December, the toy group also moved its estimated $20 million European advertising to Grey Advertising from Foote, Cone & Belding.

Sales in General Mills' restaurant group, which represents 0.8% of the domestic restaurant industry, increased 17.3% to $984.5 million during fiscal 1983, while profits rose 1% to $80 million. Advertising for the group reached $29.8 million, most of which was for Red Lobster Inns.

Measured spending for Red Lobster increased 5.3% to $25.9 million, during calendar 1982. Red Lobster, the largest division in the restaurant group, with about 351 units and sales of about $2.1 million per unit, continued its plan to expand by 30 to 35 units per year through 1988. The plan calls for the company to extend its presence on the West Coast with new building designs and new California menus. The chain also stepped up efforts toward tapping East Coast markets by moving into the Baltimore/Washington area and is "playing with" the idea of Red Lobster dinner houses in downtown locations. The company also planned to expand in existing areas by purchasing existing units from other companies.

During the year, Red Lobster received Canadian approval to open units in that country and began testing international expansion into Japan.

York Steak House, which has sales of about $1.2 million per unit, was repositioned to broaden its menu offerings, and in February, reported that a third of its sales were in nonbeef items added within the last year. A new ad campaign began during the year under the theme, "Good steak and a whole lot more." Ad spending for the chain, which has about 140 units, was $2.5 million, about the same as last year.

Casa Gallardo, the Mexican food dinner house, concentrated on menu development by adding new chicken items to complement the traditional beef dinners. The chain added units primarily in the Midwest and South over the past year.

A small-budget advertising effort of $258,000 in measured media for calendar 1982 targeted upscale singles and couples aged 25 to 49. Per-unit sales in prototype stores are more than $2 million, according to the company. Ramon Gallardo, who still heads the chain he founded, is featured in the advertising.

Darryl's turn-of-the-century atmosphere chain continued its expansion into additional southeastern markets, which is expected to continue to be its primary target for the next few years. The company has developed prototype stores doing more than $2 million in sales per unit and has cited an effort to obtain advertising efficiencies a reason for regional expansion. But Leading National Advertisers reports less than $500,000 was spent on the chain in calendar 1982.

Good Earth healthfood restaurants began its expansion to the East Coast with three test units in Florida during 1982 and 1983. The chain is adding dinner entrees and testing a new prototype design to become a full-service chain and attract new consumers. Measured advertising for the 40-unit chain was $564,600 in 1982.

The weak climate for apparel retailing adversely affected sales and profits in General Mills fashion group, which is now emphasizing branded and better merchandise. Fiscal 1983 profits fell 25.4% to $76 million on a 6.2% sales decline to $616 million. Nonetheless, General Mills foresees growth in the athletic/leisure wear and accessories market, as well as in the women's career apparel market, in which the company is positioning its lines to younger consumers.

Measured spending for the total fashion group, which includes the Izod/LaCoste, Ship 'n Shore, Foot-Joy shoes, Monet and Yves St. Laurent jewelry, Oscar de la Renta clothing and Cacharel neckwear, totaled about $4.3 million in measured spending.

The specialty retailing group benefited from a stronger home decorating market that aided sales at the weak Wallpapers To Go unit, despite an 11% decrease in measured ad spending for that division to $2.2 million in calendar 1982.

Increased profits, to $16.1 million in 1982 from last year's $11.9 million loss, reflected the disposition of the Bowers & Ruddy rare coin business and the Harris Stamp Co. more than strong improvements in the other retail units. Sales declined 5.3% in fiscal 1983 to $429.1 million.

LeeWards crafts stores, seen as having "strong potential" in the $22.5 billion crafts market, received just more than $1 million in measured ad spending during calendar 1982, down 9.5% from 1981. Measured advertising for the Eddie Bauer sports and outdoor gear stores was $320,700 in 1982; Talbots women's stores received about $400,000.

General Motors Corp., Detroit, the third largest national advertiser, increased 1982 ad expenditures 37% to $549 million as sales dropped but profits rose.

GM's 1982 profit of $962.7 million was a big improvement over 1981's $333.4 million. Dollar sales worldwide slipped on lower unit sales to some $60 billion from more than $62 billion the previous year.

However, sales have been joining profits in making a rebound during 1983. Sales in the first six months of the new year increased 13% to $36.14 billion as profits hit $1.7 billion, an increase of 147% over the comparable six-month period a year earlier. The company cited an improved economy that has stimulated car production and sales, a significant rise in GM's overseas output, strong performance abroad with its subcompact, Corsa, and reduced foreign exchange losses.

In fiscal 1982 as in fiscal 1981, General Motors Acceptance Corp., the financial arm, was responsible for the bulk of the profit. GMAC and its subsidiaries earned a record $688 million in 1982, beating the previous year's record high of $365.2 million. GMAC was also in the forefront of GM's marketing strategies, which saw a string of interest rate ceiling promotions on the financing of vehicles.

The whopping ad expenditures came to promote the interest rate ceilings and other special marketing devices. That accounted for a more than doubling of unmeasured media expenditures—to $154 million from $65 million. Newspaper outlays also increased for the special deals to $82 million from $65.5 million. Spot tv just about doubled to $27.2 million from $13.9 million, and magazine use went up to $86 million from $65.4 million.

GM sold more than 4.5 million new vehicles in the U.S. in 1982, down from 4.6 million in 1981. The slump came in cars which fell 7% to 3.5 million autos. The sale of a million trucks was up 23% and took up the slack. GM's market share remained at 43% of U.S vehicle sales.

Worldwide sales of 6.2 million cars and trucks were down about 8% from 1981. Specifically, overseas sales rose 7% to 1.7 million units, including more than 1 million in Europe, for a gain of 16%.

It was to the East that GM turned for future sales help—a joint venture deal with Japan's Toyota to produce a Toyota-designed subcompact at a GM plant at Freemont, Cal. Under the agreement, which still needs government approval, some 200,000 cars a year are planned under the 12-year joint venture, starting in the 1985 model year. The idea was to give GM some small car manufacturing expertise from Toyota (which supplies half the components), and it takes the heat off Toyota to build a U.S. plant.

GM also has a subcompact car under development with Isuzu Motors Ltd., a Japanese auto maker it partially owns, and with Suzuki for mini-cars. The Toyota joint venture cars would be sold to Chevrolet which would also get the Isuzu and Suzuki models.

GM also tried a "joint venture" with the United Auto Workers as 1982 got under way. GM said it would pass along concessions from the UAW to consumers by way of price cuts. The deal fell through, and GM went ahead on its own with rebates, because sales slowed as buyers awaited the UAW-GM price cuts. GM also imposed 2% givebacks on its suppliers, including ad agencies that complied. An effort to include media costs fell flat.

N W Ayer, one of GM's corporate agencies, bested D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, another corporate account holder, for a new $15 million campaign, "We're the best GM ever."

Chevrolet division was far from the best Chevrolet ever, as car sales and market share plunged. Only truck sales were a bright spot.

Total car sales were down to 1.2 million from 1.4 million; trucks jumped to 808,805 from 675,628 units. Overall sales slipped to 2.07 million from 2.1 million units in 1981. Market share dipped to 15.8% from 16.9%.

Ad spending for Chevrolet increased to an estimated $142.9 million from $127.5 million. Increases came in network tv to around $75.4 million from $59.2 million—over-all tv spending increased to $80.3 million from $62.5 million. Magazine spending went to $26.4 million from $19.6 million and newspaper increased to $31.9 million from $25.5 million.

Light conventional trucks were out in front for truck lines with 393,277 units, up from 403,487 in 1981. The S-10 truck turned sales of 177,758 units in the first calendar sales year.

Chevrolet's 1981 ad theme: "Chevy's up ahead" was replaced and a new umbrella popped for 1982 that said: "Chevy makes good things happen."

The Cavalier was "reintroduced" in 1982, with greater emphasis on technology, while the midsize models were grouped together in an ad as "Chevrolet's classics."

The new shape of the Camaro represented something of a return to performance for Chevrolet. The Z-28 performance model ads boasted: "The only thing that can keep pace with it is its shadow." Chevy aired the first long-form stereo cable commercial on Warner Amex's MTV: Music Television channel.

The Camaro and front-wheel-drive intermediate Celebrity, both introduced in January, carried Chevy's hopes for "image enhancement." Celebrity ads used the theme, "The bright new shape of Chevrolet." Thomas Staudt, general marketing manager, said, "Our advertising on Celebrity is designed to build and strengthen our image of technology."

The 1983 theme became more aggressive as Chevy shouted "USA-1 taking charge." Ad copy stated, "You'll discover Chevrolet is taking charge in providing better, more exciting and affordable products."

The division concentrated on marketing Chevy the brand, Chevy the car builder, and targeted "new" car prospects who where "undecided" as to what to buy. Special "corporate image" commercials were run on the final episode of "M*A*S*H" in February. Chevrolet/Eastern Air Lines launched a campaign in the fall giving buyers of Chevy vehicles two free tickets on Eastern flights.

The new Corvette made its debut with special magazine inserts and newspaper ads in 50 top markets in March, 1983. Ads bragged that it was "The best production sports car in the world."

The charge by trucks was led by light trucks and especially the new compact models. Chevrolet S-10 truck was the big seller for Chevy with 177,758 units sold in 1982. Total truck sales surpassed last year's, rising to 799,916 from 675,628 units. Chevy became the truck sponsor for the United States Football League games on ABC-TV for the 1983 season.

Chevy also did some reorganizing among its executive staff in 1982 and early 1983. Robert Stempel moved to general manager from vp of European-sourced GM vehicles and managing director of Adam Opel in Germany. Robert Lund became vp of corporate sales and marketing staff. Russell Chick was promoted to director of national advertising from car ad manager. Stephen McAvoy became manager of passenger car advertising.

Buick fared well in 1982, with increases in both total unit sales and market share. Unit sales rose to 723,011 from last year's 722,617 units, with the Century front-wheel-drive model selling 99,873 units in its first year. Market share climbed to 9.06% from 8.45% in 1981.

Buick ad outlays rose to $43.7 million from $36.6 million, with tv down a bit to $16.3 million from $16.9 million. Newspaper rose about $4 million to $16.2 million and magazine expenditures were up to $7.9 million from $5.9 million.

The "Wouldn't you really rather have a Buick?" umbrella theme carried on through 1982, with the hawk flying high.

Century, Buick's front-wheel-drive A-body, was introduced with "It's the year of the Century," and the Skyhawk, rebated before it was even introduced, sold 46,942 units in its debut year.

In the fall of 1983, in an effort to broaden and penetrate the entire marketplace more effectively, Buick is driving for diversity.

The Riviera went topless in the fall of 1982. Mr. Reuss explained, "The convertible fits in with our philosophy of classic elegance and has a halo effect on the entire line." Riviera was aimed at women drivers.

In the fall of 1982, Buick pushed special models into growth areas. A Buick official said, "The days of building cars that are all things to all people are over."

The T-types, with European look and feel, were designed to increase market penetration and are geared at specific growth areas. Skyhawk, Skylark, Century Regal and Riviera models were targeted for T-formations.

Oldsmobile suffered erosions in total sales but increased market share. Sales fell to 799,585 units from 848,739, with the new subcompact Firenza, introduced in March, 1982, selling 28,282 units. Market share advanced to 10.02% from 9.95% in 1981.

Oldsmobile increased its ad spending to $44.8 million from $39 million with increases in tv to $17.6 million from $14.8 million; magazines to $10 million from $7.7 million, and newspaper to $15.8 million from $12.7 million.

Style was the watchword at Oldsmobile as the new umbrella theme, "Even today, there's room to do it with style," was introduced. Oldsmobile brought out the front four-wheel-drive A-body, the Ciera, as part of the Cutlass line, with "Cutlass Ciera, the only front-wheel drive that's a Cutlass."

The subcompact Firenza, born with a cash rebate, was introduced in March, 1982. Ads concentrated on making the new model a member of the Olds family with the tag, "Firenza. It's what a small car can be when it's an Oldsmobile." The Firenza commercials targeted young but still upscale buyers. In the fall of 1982, Oldsmobile announced a 12% increase in its advertising budget for 1983, handled by Leo Burnett USA.

Oldsmobile kept the same basic advertising strategies for the fall but utilized some new techniques. Ciera ads focused on the technical aspects of the car. The tag was, "This car of the future is built on its past," emphasizing the Cutlass membership. The Delta 88 used the same line, "The family car that didn't forget the family." Olds 98 maintained its "logic carried to its most luxurious conclusion." The Toronado stuck with snob appeal: "This personal luxury car does more than stand out. It stands alone."

Specialty cars were also used to spark excitement and diversity into the Oldsmobile line. Joseph Sanchez, now general manager, said, "Specialty cars are not what pays the dividend. They are necessary to keep excitement in the line, to be totally competitive. Specialty cars do have a place, but as support to our total volume."

Specialty cars for 1983 include the Holiday, built off a Cutlass Ciera body and featuring a vinyl roof; Ciera ES; Hurst Olds, a neo-hot rod; the Firenza GT; Omega X with GT package, and a Cutlass Supreme with different appearance items.

Pontiac slipped another notch in both market share and unit sales in 1982.

Sales declined to 483,149 units from 522,394 and market share plummeted to 6.1% from 6.4% in 1981.

Firebird was the shining star for Pontiac in 1982, with a large sales increase of 105,686 units from 52,188.

Pontiac ad spending rose just a little to $47.4 million from $45 million, with increases in magazines—to $10 million from $4.7 million—and newspaper to $12.8 million from $9.8 million. Tv was flat at $29 million in 1982, compared with $29.4 million in 1981. D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius spent the year disputing rumors that it stood on "shaky ground" with Pontiac. There was a rough patch in relations, which has subsequently been smoothed over with new creative input.

Failing to spark sales in the fuel economy market, Pontiac decided on a strategy switch. The "more Pontiac know-how to the gallon" line was dropped for the umbrella theme: "Now the excitement begins."

Jim Graham, director of merchandising, said, "When Pontiac was riding high, third in the industry, it was because we had a very special image, our own image, and it was stylish, sporty, fast . . . ." With a nearly 24% drop in total sales, Pontiac put its efforts into building that image.

The new marketing move was officially kicked off in January, 1982, with the new Pontiac 6000, a European-style road car aimed directly at top imports in the class. The 6000 challenged Eurosedans with "The Road Kings have a new rival."

After a dismal showing in 1981, Firebird Trans AM made a comeback, wearing sleeker, less cluttered attire and doubled its sales. The new ads boasted—"The taming of a sinister force."

Pontiac counted on its two new sporty models to complete the new "excitement image" lineup.

The convertible Sunbird (J2000) has an "aura of excitement," according to William Hoglund, general manager. The snappy Fiero sportster is designed to appeal not only to the two-seater beret set but to hot rodders, dune buggy users and singles. The Pontiac body will not be shared with other GM divisions. The initial production target is scheduled at 100,000 units for introduction as a 1984 model.

Despite the recession, Cadillac posted gains in both market share and sales. Cadillac sales rose more than 10% in calendar 1982, a poor sales year for the auto industry. Unit sales climbed to 249,295 units from 230,665, with only the Cimarron suffering a slight loss. Market share rose from 2.7% to 3.1%.

Cadillac ad spending went up modestly to about $21.2 million from $19.6 million with tv rising to $9.5 million from $7.5 million. Newspaper was up a bit to $5.9 million from $4.7 million, and magazines rose to $5.1 million from $4.7 million.

Cadillac sent forth its 1982 models with the umbrella theme, "Best of all . . . it's a Cadillac." The division tried to broaden its market from older prospects to include young, affluent import buyers with the Cimarron.

Simple, direct ad lines were used for the other Cadillac models as well, with Seville announced as "a car for those who seek the better things in life." Eldorado Touring Coupe got the pitch, "A different breed of Cadillac" and DeVille claimed "you deserve it."

The 1983 ad message remained the same. The luxury market got the most attention and media weight, with the more European-styled cars, the Cimarron and Eldorado Touring Coupe on the sidelines. The 1983 ads for the Cimarron touted a new line: "Cimarron '83. Cuts through the import mystique." The other European-styled car, Eldorado Touring Coupe, got its own series of "buff"-book ads. The Eldorado TC, with stiffer suspension and blackwall tires, helps the Cadillac image, according to L.B. Pryor, general sales manager.

General Motors drove full speed into the global truck battle in 1982 with great hopes for the future. GM teamed with Isuzu, owned 34% by GM, in a joint effort in Europe. GM restructured truck operations of the GM Assembly, Chevrolet, GMC into a single division within the new world wide Truck & Bus Group. The Bedford Commercial Vehicle division, Great Britain, also joined the group.

On the car side, General Motors stepped up operations of North American Vehicles Overseas division to increase sales of U.S.-built cars internationally. GM's overseas ad campaign in 1981 and most of 1982 consisted of "dramatic impact:" A Camaro ad showed an astronaut's legs in boots and the space shuttle in the background, while other ads used cowboy boots and the like.

The feet were gone in late 1982. The Overseas division, via McCann-Erickson, moved toward more realistic ad shots. Canadian sales fell 33% to 327,000 units and GM's market share slipped to 36% from 41%. In Europe, GM finished a three-year expansion program with the introduction of the small Opel Corsa. Latin American sales were up slightly to 326,000 units and market penetration increased to 18% from 16%. Sales in Brazil increased 20% to 166,000 units. Sales fell 18% to 161,000 vehicles in the Middle East and Africa while Asia/Pacific region sales rose slightly to 207,000 units.

*LNA estimate

Gillette Co., Boston, the 37th largest national advertiser, decreased its ad spending 5% to $163 million in 1982.

Worldwide sales in 1982 were $2.2 billion, down 4%. Earnings still managed a 9% increase. So far into 1983, sales have remained sluggish. For the first six months of 1983, sales were $1.07 billion, vs. $1.1 billion for the first six months of 1982. Net income for the same period was $70.3 million for 1983, down slightly from $70.8 million. Net income, however, for the second quarter in 1983 showed a 3.7% increase over the same period a year ago.

For 1982, Gillette's four major lines and their percentage contributions to sales were: Blades and razors, 35%, up from 33% in 1981; personal care, 30%, up from 28%; writing instruments, 12%, down from 13%, and Braun products, 18%, down from 20%. Profits were up slightly for blades and razors, significantly for personal care and Braun and way down for writing instruments.

The company continued its traditionally aggressive marketing policies in 1982, especially in the launch of new products. "The changing of the Guard," a $28 million, six-month effort to relaunch Right Guard deodorant, began June 1 of this year.

Analysts expect that Right Guard will now regain some of the preeminence it held in the deodorant/antiperspirant market before the collapse of aerosols.

It has been reformulated and repackaged, and a strong masculine identity remains its ad thrust. Gillette recently won a decision in U.S. district court against Mennen, which had claimed that the new Right Guard packaging was too similar to some of Mennen's graphic trademarks. Mennen is appealing the decision.

Sales for the personal care division hit a plateau last year, after several years of steady growth. Profits were up, though, as a strong advance in the profitability of North American sales offset declining profits abroad. The record of recent sales growth was produced largely by Gillette's successful entry into the women's-products market, with items like Silkience shampoo. Other new products in the personal care line are Bare Elegance, a "moisturizing body shampoo" launched nationally this spring after a regional launch in 1982; Mink Difference replenishing shampoo, added this spring as a companion to the hairspray launched in 1981, and Aapri Apricot replenishing Lotion, also added this spring, joining a facial scrub introduced last year.

Gillette spent heavily to introduce the new products. Bare Elegance is budgeted to get $16 million in marketing and promotional support, Aapri got $17 million and Mink Difference got $13.8 million.

Two new products introduced in early 1982 sold well: Silkience conditioning hairspray and For Oily Hair Only shampoo and conditioner. Strong sales of those products made up for the drop in sales of Silkience shampoo and conditioner.

Silkience skin moisturizer, introduced in late 1981, also is not performing as well as expected in a market dominated by Richardson-Vicks' Oil of Olay. It has won only a 3.6% market share, despite $4.2 million in ad support in 1982.

The blade and razor division showed a minuscule sales increase in 1982, matched by a small increase in profits. The division remained Gillette's most profitable, though: Gillette dominates almost all world markets in this field, and nearly three-quarters of the company's worldwide profits come from blades and razors.

Atra pivoting-head cartridges won the No. 1 share of the U.S. blade market in 1982, overtaking Trac II, another Gillette brand, which had held that spot for nine years. Atra did well in European markets and entered Latin American and Japanese markets in 1982.

The Good News! razor remained No. 1 in disposable, despite an aggressive marketing challenge from Bic shaver and a new disposable entry from Scripto, maker of Wilkinson Sword blades. Disposables are the fastest growing part of the wet-shave market, with total disposable sales up to 32% of all unit sales for blades in 1982. Good News!, Swivel (Gillette's pivoting-head disposable) and Daisy (the disposable women's shaver) control 60% of market.

Women account for 50% of all sales of disposable razors, including brands marketed chiefly for men. The company estimates that almost half of all Good News! buyers are women, for instance. Gillette moved to take advantage of this market with new 1982 ads for Good News!, which featured both men and women touting the razor, with a jingle themed "Two blades are better than one blade." The ads marked the first time Gillette had advertised any razor product other than Daisy or Just Whistle as suitable for women. Just Whistle is a plastic handle for Atra blades, introduced in 1981.

Ad spending on Trac II is now only for "promotional things." Instead, ad dollars have shifted to Atra, which has higher profit margins. It is the company's philosophy to heavily back its leading brand in any given market.

Gillette plans to continue strong promotion of its blades and razors in 1983, with frequent promotional pricing efforts to match those of the competition. The Widget, a household scraping tool with a safety handle and several blades, was the division's lone product introduction in 1982.

Backed by $1.7 million in advertising and promotion, mostly on network tv, the Widget "met sales expectations," the company said.

Gillette's biggest problems in 1982 were in the writing instruments division. Unit volume grew to one billion pens and refills, but sales were down roughly $30 million and "profits fell sharply," according to company chairman Colman Mockler. Products included Eraser Mate II and Write Bros. pens (both lower-priced brands), Eraser Mate and Flair pens, the Mark VI luxury pen (made in France for European markets), and Liquid Paper office products. Gillette blamed a weak economy and an overemphasis on lower-price products for the division's weak showing. An improved economy in 1983 should restore some of those lost profits, but heavy competition against the low-end line could continue to keep that part of the business less profitable, according to analysts.

Gillette pursued a trimming strategy in the Braun products division in 1982, which produced a drop in sales—from $451 million to $403 million—but a sharp rise in profits. The company continued to divest Braun of its photo and hi-fi businesses to concentrate on small household appliances, most marketed exclusively in Europe.

Over-all, Gillette seems well positioned to maintain its strength both home and abroad. But stronger currencies in foreign markets (Gillette gets 55% of sales abroad), and new product development in the personal care field are seen by the company as necessary for growth.

Gillette has seen a need to advertise beyond network sports programs and began experimenting with cable networks ESPN, USA and Turner Broadcasting System's superstation, WTBS-TV.

The company is close-mouthed about the results of its cable test.

Gillette spent the following in measured media advertising for some of its major products during 1982: $4.9 million for Silkience shampoo and $6.4 million for Silkience conditioner; $7.7 million for Soft & Dri antiperspirant solid; $7.4 million for the Atra shaving system; $7.3 million for Aapri facial scrub; $5.6 million for Good News! and Swivel disposable razors; $5.9 million for For Oily Hair Only shampoo and conditioner, and $8.2 million for Dry Idea antiperspirant roll-on.

GrandMet USA, Montvale, N.J., the nation's 91st largest advertiser, spent an estimated $54 million on advertising in 1982, a 24% increase over 1981.

In 1982, the company, formerly known as the Liggett Group, had sales of $1.35 billion, up 25% over 1981. Earnings jumped to $77.9 million, an increase of 45% over the $53.6 million recorded in 1981.

GrandMet, a subsidiary of Grand Metropolitan PLC, London, is divided into a number of principal product groups: Cigarets, chewing and smoking tobaccos, spirits, wines, pet foods, soft drinks and sporting goods.

Liggett & Myers Tobacco Co., Durham, N.C., markets L&M, Chesterfield, Lark and Eve cigarets. L&M, the smallest of the nation's six major cigaret companies, is the lone marketer of generic and private-label cigarets. Sales increased to $377 million in 1982, up from $308 million in 1981. Operating income earnings for cigarets reached $48 million, up considerably from $28 million in 1981.

The increase came from the continuing success of generic cigarets, which more than doubled in sales volume in the last year. First introduced by Liggett in 1980, generic cigarets are now the fastest-growing cigaret category in the U.S. L&M has built up a hold on most of the major supermarket chains, which account for 75% of generic/store brand sales. Studies show that generics are being purchased by middle-income and upper-income consumers. They have boosted L&M's market share to 4.5%, or double the company's total in just two years.

Liggett's portfolio of generics was expanded by adding "Ultra Lights" in both king and 100mm sizes in order to compete in the rapidly growing low tar segment of the market.

Measured media spending was reserved for Eve cigarets. In 1982, L&M spent $4.9 million to boost the brand in magazine ads.

Liggett's chewing and smoking tobaccos are marketed by the Pinkerton Tobacco Co., which saw operating income increase to $12 million in 1982, compared with $9 million in 1981. Sales of Red Man chewing tobacco were slightly higher, making the company's principal brand the largest-selling chewing tobacco in the U.S. Contributing to increased sales of Red Man were improved quality control, additional advertising and distribution benefits arising from the consolidation of the Pinkerton and cigaret sales forces.

Another GrandMet unit, Allen Products, increased the sales of its principal brand, Alpo, and raised its share of the total canned dog food market to a record high 23%. Operating income in 1982 totaled $23 million, up from $19 million the year before.

Despite intense competition in the premium dog food market and an increase in private label and generic products, Alpo remains the best-selling canned dog food in the U.S.

In addition, Allen has managed to reverse the declining sales of Alpo beef-flavored dinner, as well as make a significant sales gain in the highly competitive dry dog food category.

The Liv-A-Snaps line of pet food treats maintained its leadership position with a solid gain in sales. A new product, Beef Bite Treats, was introduced into the growing category.

Major media spending for the pet foods division was as follows: Alamo brand dry dog food, $1.3 million; Alpo canned dog food, $5.4 million, and Alpo Dog Treats, $1.2 million.

Unfavorable weather and the weak economy combined to make GrandMet's soft-drink bottling operations suffer moderate declines in sales. Operating income for the soft drink operations was down to $27 million from $28 million in 1981.

Both of the company's major Pepsi-Cola franchises, one in the Southeast and the other on the West Coast, have dominant market shares in their high-consumption soft-drink territories. Atlantic Soft Drink Co. recently expanded its business by acquiring another franchise, adding three counties in western South Carolina. Atlantic also expanded its product line by adding "Pepsi Free," a new caffeine-free cola, available in both regular and sugar-free versions.

In October, Pepsi-San Joaquin in California opened its new operating facility, a four-building complex of almost 250,000 sq. ft., thereby consolidating the greater part of bottling operations at one location.

Sales of GrandMet's physical fitness and sporting products, manufactured by Diversified Products Corp., declined in 1982, a drop the company attributed to the continuing adverse effects of the economy. Operating income was down to $12 million in 1982 from $13 million last year. Diversified Products is a leader in fitness products for home use. To strengthen and maintain that lead, the company spent $1.1 million in 1982 to advertise DP Physical Fitness Equipment.

International Distillers & Vintners, the wine and spirits division of GrandMet, saw its earnings in the U.S. rise to $47 million in 1982 from $36 million the previous year. Paddington and Carillon are the IDV units that distribute wines and spirits for IDV in the U.S. Earnings were $46 million.

Paddington's J&B Rare maintained its position as the leading scotch whisky in the U.S., and Bailey's Original Irish Cream increased volume by a whopping 50%. Sales of Bailey's are running about one million cases a year, one of the most remarkable brand success stories in the industry.

The company launched two new products during the year: Demi-Tasse, a coffee cream liqueur with cognac, and Malibu, a white spirit that combines Caribbean rum with grain neutral spirits and coconut.

Profits at Carillon Importers almost doubled as a result of the strength of their imported brands and the increased promotion behind them. Grand Marnier improved its position as the leading French liqueur, gaining 10% in volume. Bombay gin held even in sales, even though imported gins declined as a category.

Absolut vodka moved up fast, and is now, after only two years, close to second place among vodka brands imported into the U.S. IDV's Piat d'Or increased its sales fourfold, and is beginning to emerge as a brand leader among French wines sold in America.

The company spent $1.2 million on Absolut vodka, $6.4 million on Bailey's Irish Cream and $1.1 million on Bombay English gin. Ad support for Grand Marnier liqueur totaled $2.9 million in 1982. The popular J&B scotch received $7.4 million.

Greyhound Corp., the nation's 73rd largest advertiser, spent $75.2 million on advertising in 1982, a 0.6% decline from ad levels the previous year.

Advertising at Greyhound reflected the over-all sluggish state of the corporation, whose sales dipped 1.7% to $5.075 billion and earnings fell 25.5% to $103 million. The company attributes that to continuing losses at Armour Foods and a marginal decline in bus travel.

Greyhound is in a state of flux: It has agreed to sell its Armour Food Co. meat-processing and packing business for $166 million in cash and stocks to ConAgra Inc., Omaha.

There also is talk of the sale of the Armour-Dial subsidiary, which includes Dial soap, the leading bar soap in the nation the past 20 years. Greyhound is reportedly on the lookout for new acquisitions in new fields while accelerating in its basic industry, transportation, a plan being directed by new chairman John W. Teets. He succeeded Gerald H. Trautman, who had been at the helm of Greyhound since 1965.

The company's first foray into the acquisition market in 1982 ended with the cancellation of an agreement to purchase California-based Peter Piper pizza restaurants. The position of Mr. Teets reportedly was that pizza has gone about as far as it can go.

A liquid soap called Liqua 4 went national during the year, but hasn't caused much excitement in the market place as yet. Advertising positioned it as a "unique moisturizer" to separate it from bar soaps and to go a bit farther on the path created by Minnetonka's Softsoap.

There were no agency changes at Greyhound during the year, but the halls of the company's Phoenix headquarters were said by marketing employes to have been "very active with agency personnel." One reason for this is "what to do about increasing our bus travel," said one Greyhound marketing executive.

Proposals apparently have been put forth to compete in a more head-on manner with the airline industry, which has slashed fares through a major part of Greyhound's turf—the desert Southwest.

Other proposals from agency people have continued to play up the Trailways rivalry, but so far not to Mr. Teets' satisfaction. Evidently the Trailways-Greyhound price war is over for now. Part of the reason for continued gains in the face of reduced air fares is increased emphasis on charter busing and international services, plus special markets that Greyhound has been cultivating. One of these is the "Elderhostel" program of trips for the retired to educational seminars.

There has also been more focus put into Greyhound bus manufacturing (one of the leading money makers in the corporation) and Greyhound Food Management, which operates Greyhound's chain of Briarpatch restaurants in Kentucky and Indiana. The company sees this chain, which is more of a pub-type operation than Greyhound bus stops, as one of its future growth areas.

In the personnel category, there were surprisingly few changes during 1982, with the exception of Mr. Trautman's departure at the age of 70. That had been expected for more than a year. William Robertson took over as senior vp-group marketing director, Armour-Dial Co.

Gulf & Western Industries, New York, the 42nd largest national advertiser, increased its U.S. advertising expenditures by 43% to $155.1 million in 1982 from $108.5 million the previous year. The large increase came on the strength of heavy advertising and promotion at G&W's biggest spender, Paramount Pictures Corp. Other heavy advertisers in the G&W family were Kayser-Roth Corp., Simon & Schuster and Simmons Co.

G&W's net sales of $6.42 billion in fiscal 1982 were down 1.5% from fiscal 1981. Net earnings decreased even more markedly, declining by 21.2% to $199.0 billion in fiscal 1982.

Major changes have been taking place at G&W since February when its chairman and chief executive officer, Charles Bluhdorn, died of a heart attack.

The biggest change was announced in mid-August when G&W released a preliminary earnings report covering fiscal 1983 ended July 31. It announced it was writing off $470 million for the year in the divestiture of its natural resources operations, two racetracks and various other operations, including Sega Enterprises, a marketer of coin-operated video games. The write-off would produce a loss in earnings of $215 million for the year. Income from continuing operations, though, would be about $225 million in 1983, compared with $165 million in 1982.

In addition, the company reorganized its corporate structure, reducing its operations from seven groups to three: Entertainment and communications, financial services and consumer and industrial products. Mr. Bluhdorn was replaced by Martin S. Davis. Mr. Davis, who took the position of vice-chairman and ceo, immediately began to streamline the company.

The poorly performing natural resources division proved first to go. Its contribution in fiscal 1982 to over-all operating income among G&W groups was −3%, compared with leisure time, 23%; consumer products, 20%; food products, 17%; manufacturing, 16%; automotive and building products, 7%, and financial services, 20%.

The entertainment and communications group, which had revenues of $1.4 billion in 1982, comprises Paramount Pictures Corp. and its subsidiaries; Simon & Schuster, publisher of hardcover and paperback books; Sega Enterprises, manufacturer of coin-operated videogames; Madison Square Garden Corp., the sports and entertainment organization; Famous Players Ltd., which operates theaters in Canada and France, and Famous Music Corp., which is engaged in the business of music publishing copyrights.

Paramount was the corporation's biggest advertiser with expenditures of $75.4 million in fiscal 1982, compared with $50.8 million in fiscal 1981. Measured media ad spending in calendar 1982 totaled $21.4 million, up from $18.3 million in 1981. The company's film rentals in the U.S. and Canada brought in $200.3 million in fiscal 1982. Paramount Pictures' biggest box-office successes in 1982 were "An Officer and a Gentleman," starring Richard Gere, Debra Winger and Lou Gousett Jr., who won an Oscar for best supporting actor, and "Star Trek II: The Wrath of Khan."

"Star Trek II" broke eight box office records, including attracting the highest amount in box office receipts over one weekend: $4.4 million at 1,621 theaters.

Paramount is planning a sequel, "Star Trek: In Search of Spock." Other films released in 1982 included "Airplane II: The Sequel" and "48 Hours."

This past spring, Paramount began using video trailers to promote its movie. For the popular "Flashdance," the studio used two-minute spots on MTV: Music Television, the Warner Amex cable program, and on "Night Flight," the music program on USA Network.

Also, in January, Sherry Lansing resigned as president of the movie production division of 20th Century-Fox Film Corp. to form, along with producer Stanley Jaffe ("Kramer vs. Kramer"), Jaffe-Lansing Productions, a company affiliated with Paramount.

Miss Universe Inc. moved from Gulf & Western's Kayser-Roth to Paramount Pictures' supervision in 1982. The move is an indication that the pageant will expand its tv and cable tv reach, as well as its licensing operations. In July, 1982, Miss Universe posted a 24.7 rating and 43 share.

USA Cable network, in which Paramount Pictures holds a 33% interest, topped its monthly record in advertising revenue in June, 1982, selling nearly $4 million in spots. The network, which has about 20 million subscribers, began testing a pay-per-view network in two systems during the fall of 1982.

Paramount Television had nine network tv series on the air during the 1982-83 season: "Family Ties," "Cheers," "The Powers of Matthew Star," "Joanie loves Chachi," "Happy Days," "Laverne and Shirley," "Taxi," "Star of the Family" and "The New Odd Couple."

In addition, "The Winds of War," an 18-hour miniseries based on Herman Wouk's best seller and produced by Paramount, was aired through the week of Feb. 6 in five installments. The series, which cost $43 million to produce, starred Robert Mitchum, Ali MacGraw, Jan Michael Vincent and Polly Bergen. "A Woman Called Golda," a dramatization of the life of Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir, starring the late Ingrid Bergman, swept its time slot in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and San Francisco; in New York it had a 23.6 Nielsen rating.

Bristol-Myers, General Foods, Lever Bros., Warner-Lambert and S.C. Johnson & Son were among the sponsors most supportive of Paramount Television domestic division's barter syndication shows.

"Solid Gold" was selling in more than 200 outlets, "Madame's Place" in more than 80 (about 15% above the percentage targeted tv homes) and "Entertainment Tonight" in about 200.

In another entertainment area, Paramount Home Video sold an estimated 3 million videodiscs in 1982; in 1981 its own "Airplane" was the top disc seller. In addition, Paramount Home Video in 1982 started distributing videogame cartridges compatible with various consoles, including Atari.

Sega Enterprises, Gulf & Western's manufacturer of coin-operated games, broke new ground by advertising its Zaxxon arcade game—$294,000 in spot tv, according to Leading National Advertisers—the first time an arcade game has been advertised on tv.

Simon & Schuster, G&W's book unit, had a number of best-selling trade titles in 1982, including "Lace" by Shirley Conran; "Jane Fonda's Workout Book" by Jane Fonda; "The Last Days of America" by Paul Erdman, and "The Prodigal Daughter" by Jeffrey Archer.

Best-selling paperback titles included "This Calder Range" by Janet Daily; "Goodbye, Janette" by Harold Robbins; "Real Men Don't Eat Quiche" by Bruce Feirstein, and "The Cinderella Complex" by Colette Dowling. Best-selling trade paperbacks included "The M.B.A. Handbook" by Jim Fisk and Robert Barron; "Cat's Revenge" by Philip Leif, and "I Hate Preppies Handbook" by Ralph Schoenstein.

In 1982, Simon & Schuster spent $15 million in advertising and promotion ($6.5 million in measured spending, compared with $2.8 million in 1981) of its Silhouette Romance line of romance novels.

In addition to Silhouette Romance, the series now includes Silhouette First Love, Silhouette Special Edition, Silhouette Intimate Moments and Silhouette Desire.

An affiliate of Madison Square Garden also owns Arlington Park Race Track and operates, as a lessee, Maywood Park, both in the Chicago area.

Additionally, the company owns 80% of International Holiday on Ice, which operates five touring ice shows in Europe, Asia and Latin America.

Madison Square Garden Cablevision now brings 1.4 million cable subscribers an annual total of 135 Garden events in three-hour blocks and provides a nightly horse racing show.

G&W's consumer products group had net sales of $1.688 billion in fiscal 1982, down slightly from $1.691 billion in 1981.

The group is composed of Kayser-Roth, a diversified marketer and distributor of apparel, hosiery and textiles; Simmons Co., a worldwide leader in bedding products, and Simmons Universal, which produces a variety of home and institutional furnishings, healthcare equipment and burial caskets. (With the corporate restructuring, the group now includes industrial products operations as well.)

In January, 1983, the company sold its Consolidated Cigar Co. unit to a management group led by the cigar company's president for about $120 million.

Kayser-Roth's well known brand names include Catalina bathing suits, Cole of California and Cole Jrs., Beach 'n Beyond, Sandcastle, Going Places, Excello, Her Majesty Industries children's wear, Oscar de la Renta menswear, Liz Claiborne, Cheryl Tiegs sportswear, Cresco, Century Sportswear, Champion, John Weitz, Mr. California, John Newcombe tennis wear and Kayser intimate apparel.

Among new products introduced in 1982 were Bay Club line of misses active sportswear produced by Catalina and the Ann Cole Collection produced by Cole of California.

The company has preparations are under way to market other misses sportswear under license agreements with Jonathan Logan.

Approximately 25% of Kayser-Roth's total sales in fiscal 1982 went to Sears, Roebuck & Co., K mart and J.C. Penney Co.

The hosiery division produces women's pantyhose and stockings under such brand names as No Nonsense, Easy to Be Me, Supp-hose, Jordache and Kayser.

Men's hosiery is marketed under such names as Interwoven, Esquire, Supp-hose, Sock Sense and Fruit of the Loom.

No Nonsense was the recipient of the most measured advertising support, $6.9 million in 1982, though the total was down substantially from the $11.1 million spent in 1981.

During fiscal 1982, Kayser-Roth acquired the Burlington ladies hosiery and Burlington socks divisions of Burlington Industries.

In fiscal 1982, Simmons Co. introduced the Beautyrest Gemini, which has two separate "Comfort Cores"—either conventional, hybrid waterbed or inflatable.

Mattresses marketed under the Simmons brand name were supported by $3.0 million in measured ad spending in 1982, down from $6.8 million in 1981. Other bedding products are marketed under such brand names as Beautyrest, Hide-A-Bed, Beautyrest Feelings, Maxipedic, Evening Whisper, Beautywave, Deepsleep, Simcopedic and Slumber King.

Simmons Universal Corp., the segment which markets the company's furnishings, is divided into two divisions, which sell wallcoverings, diversified fabrics and furniture under the following names: Bloomcraft, Century, Old Stone Mill, Thonet, Katzenbach and Warren, Greeff Fabrics, Gulf & Western Healthcare, Albert Van Luit and Selig.

G&W's food products group had net sales of $326 million in fiscal 1982, compared with $425 million in 1981. Of the 1982 total, some $249 million of net sales were from the company's raw and refined cane sugar business conducted primarily in the Dominican Republic and Florida.

The manufacturing group had net sales of $1.15 billion in fiscal 1982, compared with $1.16 billion in 1981, and the automotive and building products group had net sales of $540 million in fiscal 1982, down from $560 million in 1981.

The group's distribution division includes American Parts System, which markets through approximately 1,300 Big A Auto Parts Stores across the nation.

During fiscal 1982, the company opened a $2 million, 60,000-sq.-ft. facility in Houston that features what is termed the most advanced, automated materials handling equipment available.

The natural resources group had net sales of $221 million in fiscal 1982, compared with $362 million in 1981. Before it was announced the whole group would be canned, G&W had ridded itself of a cement operation, a chemical plant and mining operations of the group.

About a week before the announced sell-off of the natural resources group, group president and chief executive officer, James Poole, resigned. He was replaced by John Thompson, executive vp for natural resources.

AA estimate for calendar years

H.J. Heinz Co., the nation's 23rd largest advertiser, spent an estimated $235.7 million on domestic advertising in 1982 compared with an estimated $160.2 million the previous year.

Heinz increased its sales and earnings for the 20th consecutive fiscal year. Consolidated sales rose 1.4% to $3.7 billion and net income increased 11.1% to $214.2 million in fiscal 1982.

Heinz manufactures and markets more than 1,450 products worldwide under its Heinz U.S.A., Star-Kist Foods, Ore-Ida Food and Weight Watchers International divisions. Approximately $270 million was spent promoting those products worldwide in 1982, some $30 million more than in 1981, according to the company.

The steady increase in promotion expenditures is based on the belief that tough economic times are exactly when the marketing effort must be strengthened to avoid loss of market share and to support new products, according to president and chief executive officer, Anthony J.F. O'Reilly.

He says the company could reach promotion expenditures of nearly $300 million in 1983. (Heinz spent $150 million alone in worldwide tv advertising in 1982.)

Of the $4 billion in sales the company expects to reach in 1983, almost half or $2 billion of that will be sold under brand names other than the H.J. Heinz Co. brand.

One of those brands is that of Weight Watchers International, which is in one of the high growth markets in which the Heinz company hopes to increase in market share.

"The dimensions of this market, here and around the world, are truly impressive," says Mr. O'Reilly. He has reason for optimism, too. In the U.S. alone, it is estimated that 83 million people—71% of them women—want to lose weight, and 85% of that total female population in the U.S. has heard of the Weight Watchers name and associates the name with losing weight, says the company.

During 1982, the entire Weight Watchers line of 29 products was reformulated and relaunched with excellent results despite the recession and intense competition from Stouffer's Lean Cuisine. Monthly sales for Weight Watchers entrees were up as much as 50% compared with year-earlier periods, the company says.

Heinz is matching that success with increased advertising revenues. Media support for Weight Watchers Frozen Meals rose to $6.8 million in 1982 from $3.2 million in 1981. Measured media support for Weight Watchers Frozen Treats leaped to $1.7 million in 1982 from an almost nonexistent $3,100 budget the previous year, and this line is expected to achieve retail sales through dairies in excess of $100 million in 1983, the company reports.

Heinz also hopes to cash in on a new line of frozen low-cal desserts and a new line of low calorie salad dressings, which are now being test-marketed. Another product that is paying its own way is Heinz' Alba 77 Fit n' Frosty milk shake mix, a product that received $740,300 in measured media in 1982 compared to $374,800 in 1981. Media spending for Alba 66 Diet Hot Cocoa Mix also rose to $359,000 from $265,800 a year earlier.

Shrinking way down in promotion efforts was Heinz Baby Food on which the company spent $54,100 in 1982 compared to $182,500 in 1981.

Also hurt by an apparent oversupply and a rush of generic competition was Heinz' Star-Kist tuna, a product whose advertising budget was slashed 152% to $2.9 million in 1982 from almost $7 million in 1981.

But the company added almost $1 million to its popular Heinz Home Style canned gravies in 1982; up to $3.2 million in measured media support from an estimated $2.2 million the year before.

Spending for Heinz steak sauce almost tripled from $3.2 million in 1981 to $9.2 million. Heinz tomato ketchup received almost a 30% increase in advertising revenues for 1982, up to $15.6 million from a budget of $10.9 million the previous year.

The company sees its biggest opportunity for growth in Europe, where it recently acquired the Fratelli Sperlari candy factory in Italy and the Ets. Paul Paulet, a French fish and pet food processor in France.

In Europe, the market for tuna and pet food, which is half the size of that in the U.S., is growing faster than it is stateside. Heinz also recently purchased a majority interest in Olivine Industries, a producer of edible oils, margarine, soap, candles and feed supplements in Zimbabwe.

Expansion into new markets is part of the carefully thought out and defined plan to move "where we have the natural advantage of experience," says Mr. O'Reilly.

"Without being a low-cost producer, it is difficult, if not impossible, to make strategic acquisitions, to expand geographically or to keep new and improved products flowing into major growth markets," he adds.

"Tradition, in our view, is not reason enough for continuing to produce an item that does not pay its own way."

Hershey Foods Corp., Hershey, Pa., the nation's 88th largest national advertiser—and the one with the "E.T." connection—increased its advertising spending 6% to approximately $60 million in 1982.

Chocolate is Hershey's most famous business and in 1982 one of its newest candy entries, Reese's Pieces, benefited from an extraordinary and extraterrestrial stroke of good luck. A fortunate licensing arrangement with Universal Pictures resulted in a Reese's Pieces endorsement by that loveable alien, E.T., from the movie blockbuster of the same name.

But while it was good luck for Hershey, it was bad luck for archcompetitor M&M/Mars. The two account for two-thirds of the U.S. confectionery market. M&M/Mars had declined Universal's offer to have its M&M brand scripted into the E.T. movie, thereby opening the door for Hershey's Reese's Pieces to become "E.T.'s favorite candy," which is how Hershey has been labeling it in ads in the aftermath of the movie's stunning success.

By all counts, the E.T. connection was a promotional bonanza for Hershey. Combined with increased ad spending, it helped spur the company to a record sales of $1.57 billion consolidated, up 8% from 1981. Net income rose 17% to $94.2 million from $80.4 million.

For the first half of 1983, sales were a record $779.2 million, compared with $704.8 million in the first half of 1982. Last year's 6% increase in ad expenditures followed a nearly 37% increase for the preceding year.

Keynoting Hershey's coming of age as an advertising leader (Hershey's launched its first ever national ad campaign in 1970) was the selection last fall of Hershey vp for new-business development John Dowd as chairman of the Assn. of National Advertisers.

Hershey Foods' chocolate and confectionery segment includes Hershey Chocolate Co., H.B. Reese Candy Co. and Y&R Candies. Chocolate and confectionery product sales account for 70% of Hershey Foods consolidated sales or $1.08 billion in 1982. Despite record results, sales would have been better had not the Tylenol scare occurred around Halloween. It affected candy sales nationwide and cut Hershey sales by 20% of sales reported during the period the previous year.

The principal product groups at Hershey are bar goods, bagged items, baking ingredients, chocolate drink mixes and dessert toppings. They are registered under more than 30 brand names. On the "Chocolate Wars" front, Hershey increased the weight and price (from 25 cents to 30 cents) of its standard bar line in spring, 1982, joining the other candy bar marketers in having a 30 cents standard bar line and ending what had become, for retailers, a troublesome two-tier pricing arrangement. Meanwhile, in its continuing cash refund battle with M&M/Mars, Hershey has been offering refunds to consumers sending in Hershey wrappers.

Reese's Pieces and its E.T. tie-in was the big advertising story for Hershey in 1982. Introduced into specific markets in 1978, the new product's first full year of national distribution was 1982. When "E.T." became an overnight box office success, Reese's Pieces became a similarly overnight success at the candy counter. Nationwide sales jumped nearly 70%, and Hershey went to around-the-clock production to keep up with consumer demands.

Reese's Pieces ads began offering free E.T. stickers and E.T. T-shirts to consumers who sent in labels as proof of purchase. Hershey switched its Reese's Pieces account ($1.9 million in measured media spending in 1982) midyear to Doyle Dane Bernbach from Ogilvy & Mather.

Elsewhere on the Hershey new product front, After Eight dinner mints, previously available only in Northeast markets, were rolled out nationally around Thanksgiving. Golden Almonds got its first national ad campaign at Christmas. Skor, a chocolate-coated butter toffee bar, was introduced into test markets and Hershey's Frostin ready-to-spread cake frosting, was expanded.

In the growing granola bar market, Hershey has been gearing up a promotional salvo for its New Trail granola bar. Sources have been predicting that Hershey is now about to go "gangbusters" with New Trail in the market.

In the Canadian market, Hershey continued to concentrate promotional efforts on its new and recently-introduced product entries. Five Big Block items were introduced last year, including Pecan and Raisin Almond, both of which are unique to the Canadian market. It also supported expansions for Reese's Pieces and Special Crisp (the Canadian version of Whatchamacallit) and introduced Nibs candies.

Hershey's most heavily advertised products last year were: Hershey's candy bars, receiving more than $8 million in measured media spending (up substantially from the $7 million for the previous year); Reese's candies, $4.6 million; Reese's Pieces, $1.9 million; Hershey chocolate Kisses, $3.8 million; Whatchamacallit, $2.7 million (down $1 million); Hershey chocolate syrup, $3.2 million, and Rollo Candy, $1.4 million. Hershey chocolate chip spending, meanwhile, fell to $500,000, from $2.3 million.

Hershey Foods also operates the Friendly Ice Cream Corp. restaurant chain; San Giorgio-Skinner Co., a major pasta products producer, and Cory Foods Services, an office coffee service plan.

Friendly Ice Cream Corp., acquired by Hershey in 1979, completed the opening phase of an ongoing modification program that is repositioning the chain as an informal family restaurant. It has also been standardizing its chainwide menu.

Twenty-four new restaurants joined the chain, bringing the total to 641 at yearend. They are located primarily in the Northeast and Midwest.

tv advertising support last year, went chainwide with a line of ice cream pies after testing in late 1981. Friendly also has a new line of ice cream cakes in test.

San Giorgio-Skinner, Hershey's pasta division, markets products in approximately 50 major U.S. markets, and consists of four regional pasta companies: San Giorgio Macaroni, Lebanon, Pa.; Delmonico Foods, Louisville, Ky.; Procino-Rossi Corp., Syracuse and Skinner Macaroni Co., Omaha, Neb.

Together, the four regional companies combined for an over-all 11% sales increase from 1981.

Light 'N Fluffy elbow macaroni went into test market in early 1982 as a new companion to the Light 'N Fluffy noodle line.

San Giorgio ads continue to stress a "quality" theme line to help fight the low-price import brand and generic brand competition.

Cory Food Services had declining sales for a third straight year. The over-all coffee sales decline, however, was partly offset by growth in allied product lines such as teas, soups and canned juices, and gains for its equipment leasing services.

ITT Corp., formerly known as the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp., spent $159.1 million on advertising last year, up 4% from 1981, to rank as the 39th largest national advertiser.

Revenues for the New York-based conglomerate dropped 6% to $21.9 billion in 1982, while net income increased 4% to $702.8 million for the same period. For the first quarter of 1983, net income dropped 17% to $134 million and revenue decreased 9% to $4.9 billion.

When the company changed its name to ITT Corp. in May of this year, the switch was designed to illustrate the "substantial diversification and growth" of the company since it started as a telephone and telegraph concern in 1920. Ironically, though, the name change comes at the same time that the company is refocusing on the telecommunications business as it charts its path for the 1980s and beyond.

For the last decade or more, telecommunications had taken a back seat to growth, as ITT under then-chairman Harold Geenen grew into a conglomerate with extensive holdings in the insurance, hotel, food and forest businesses.

But the company's new chairman, Rand Araskog, is redirecting ITT to concentrate more on its original staple. Telecommunications—particularly since the court-ordered breakup of giant American Telephone & Telegraph—is again a highly competitive business, one that has important ramifications for the company.

ITT is joining those companies, including Northern Telecom and GTE Corp, that are attempting to market telecommunications equipment to Bell operating companies that have been spun off from their parent, and now have the freedom to buy their equipment from sources other than Western Electric.

At stake is the profitable U.S. market that ITT has for the most part ignored up to now. ITT is the second-largest telecommunications company after AT&T, but U.S. sales accounted for only a fraction of the company's 1982 $6.7 billion in worldwide telecommunications sales.

Now, however, ITT is going after the U.S. market with a new line of digital central office switching systems, in which it reportedly has invested more than $700 million. ITT executives have said they hope to capture 10% of the U.S. digital switching market, a share that could bring an estimated $500 million in annual sales. The System 1240, as the new line of equipment is called, is now in service or on order in more than 800 exchanges in 14 countries.

Last year, the Telecommunications and Electronics division had revenues of $6.4 billion, down 8% from the year before, while income was up 1% to $214 million.

The company spent $5.4 million in measured media on advertising for its long-distance service, and another $35,000 on its longer distance telephone service, a fast-growing market in the U.S., but one in which ITT now has less than 1% of the business.

Among ITT's consumer properties, Continental Baking Co. remained in the forefront of the food industry with its Wonder Bread and Hostess brand snacks.

The division last year went national with its Wonder Family Wheat and started testing Wonder Family Rye. Beefsteak Rye, the largest selling rye bread in the country, also was introduced in major Midwest markets in 1982.

In measured media last year, the company spent $9.5 million on Wonder Bread, $7.9 million on Hostess baked goods, $3.9 million on Home Pride bread, $1.5 million on Hostess donuts and $1.3 million on Hostess cakes.

Boston-based Sheraton Corp. expanded its network of hotels by opening or adding 37 hotels and inns, bringing its total to 447 in 52 countries. Sheraton spent $5.7 million on measured advertising for its hotels and inns located in the U.S., with most of that split between magazines and network tv.

The performance of the Insurance and Finance Group improved in 1982, despite the continuing downturn in the North American property and casualty market. Last year, net income for the group rose 2% to $374 million, while revenues increased 2% to $6 billion. The insurance companies, led by Hartford Insurance Group, reported an income on $278 million of revenues of $5.1 billion in 1982, compared to $291 million on revenues of $5.1 billion the year before. The Hartford spent $2.79 million on measured media advertising last year, $1.7 million of that to promote its business insurance policies.

In the retail lawn and garden products field, the Scott and Burpee operations spent a combined $6.3 million on measured media advertising, including $2.3 million on Scott lawn products, $1.4 million on Burpee seeds and bulbs and $1.5 million on Scott Plus 2 Weed Killer and Turf Builder.

The company continued to spend heavily on corporate advertising, $7 million last year, most of it—$4.8 million—on network tv.

International Business Machines Corp., Armonk, N.Y., the 74th largest advertiser, increased total advertising expenditures 84% in 1982, to $74.9 million from $40.7 million in 1981.

Big advertising budget winners were IBM computer services, which spent $20.1 million compared with $7.7 million in 1981, followed by corporate general promotion with an outlay of $16.4 million, compared to $4.9 million in 1981. Total measured media spending was up 7% over 1981, to $64.4 million in 1982.

IBM worldwide gross income increased 18% to $34.4 billion in 1982, with U.S. operations up 26% to $19 billion, and foreign operations rising 10% to $15.3 billion. Domestic net earnings jumped 33.4% in 1982 to $2.77 billion and foreign net earnings climbed 7% to $1.6 billion.

That performance continues into 1983. For the first six months ended June 30, 1983, worldwide net income was $2.3 billion, up 24.3% over the same period in 1982. The company reported revenues of $9.3 billion, up 46.6% as revenues from rentals dropped 12.8% to $4.9 billion and those from services climbed 17% to $3.6 billion.

During 1982, 81% or $28 billion of IBM's revenues came from sales and rental of equipment. Product purchases increased dramatically to $17 billion in 1982, 30.3% over 1981. Purchase of previously rented equipment grew by 29%—showing a 50% U.S. increase and a 7% increase in foreign markets—and purchase of new products increased by 36%. In contrast, rental income increased only 2.6% to $11 billion.

Revenues from services increased 21% to $6.4 billion in 1982; maintenance increased 18% and program product revenue increased 45%.

In the hotly contested $7.5 billion personal computer industry, estimates show that IBM's market share is about 21%, up from 7% in 1981. IBM sold an estimated 200,000 personal computers in 1982, and it is predicted that this year it will sell more than 500,000 from 235 independent retail outlets, 370 Sears and Computerland stores and 89 IBM product centers in selected European countries, the Middle East and Asia.

new image for IBM. Since 1981, via the personal computer and the endearing Tramp, the stuffy giant has been transformed into a steadily growing household fixture. Industry insiders place total expenditures for IBM's long-running personal computer ad campaign orchestrated by Lord, Geller, Federico, Einstein, New York at $36 million, the largest to date for a personal computer.

Measured media spending for personal computer systems escalated to $5.3 million in 1982, from $591,300 in 1981. Some $4.9 million was in magazines.

Another record broken in the personal computer category was with the 624-page, June issue of PC: The Independent Guide to IBM Personal Computers—the largest monthly magazine in the history of consumer magazines. PC started in February, 1982, has a circulation of 130,000, sells for $2.95 and is published by Ziff-Davis Publishing.

The company introduced a new personal computer, the IBM XT, intended mainly for business use, early this year. The main feature is an extended data-storage capacity offering nine times the maximum 64,000-character storage of the original personal computer and optional memory units for the original personal computer and the XT. IBM also introduced a printer and a 16-color display terminal that can be used to illustrate charts and graphs.

IBM expanded personal computer programs to include programing for inventory control, general ledger, time management, home and leisure use. IBM also introduced on-site service for owners of its personal computer and reduced prices for courier service by 10% to 18%.

The $700 miniprice home computer, code-named "P-nut," is scheduled to reach the consumer market late in 1983.

The IBM Displaywriter system decreased advertising expenditures 38% to $2.1 million in 1982. A new version of the Distributed Office Support System (DISOSS) software was introduced allowing the Displaywriter, the scanning computer terminal and the IBM 5520 and data processing system to be connected to an IBM communications software system that is available on the IBM 8100 information system.

In the electric typewriter field, where it has an 80% market share, the company began limited marketing in late 1982 of its first "home" typewriter, the Personal Typewriter," which went on sale in Atlanta, Dallas, Houston and Chicago. Mechanically correcting, smaller and lighter in weight than office models, it has a suggested retail price of $695.

Also introduced were Electronic 85, with a 15,500-character storage capacity, and Electronic 65, with a storage capacity of 7,400 characters, which can be upgraded on-site to Electronic 85.

Measured media expenditures for electronic typewriters increased 21% to $821,500 in 1982, and spending for Selectric typewriters rose 31% to $1.5 million. The combined budget for electric and Selectric typewriters is $2.3 million for 3.6% of the total IBM media expenditures.

For the second consecutive year, advertising expenditures for paper copiers plummeted 62% to $736,300 in 1982 from $1.9 million in 1981. The company introduced the new Series III Copier/Duplicator Model 60. It copies up to 70 pages per minute, and users can add automatic feed and copy reduction. Printers and copiers contribute an estimated 25% to IBM revenues. In the middle-to-high power, mainframe computer market IBM continues to dominate the U.S. market with a 72% share, up from 62% in 1981.

The power and range of large systems were extended with the advent of the IBM 3084, now the company's most powerful processor, and with four new models in the large-scale, advanced-technology processor series.

IBM entered a new area with two industrial robotic systems. The 7565 manufacturing system can respond to environmental changes, can be intergrated with automated manufacturing processes and features data processing. The system is suited for electronic component insertion, precision mechanical assembly, testing, light fabrication and material handling, and it can be equipped with a gripper that feels parts and tools in the work area.

IBM also entered the computer game field in 1982. According to an IBM spokesman, while the company is unwilling to declare a full-scale move into the videogame market, it is apparent that with two games in one year—Decathlon and Adventure, both manufactured by Microsoft and made for IBM's personal computer—more games will be on the way.

IBM's general systems division's measured media spending plummeted to $373,100 in 1982, from 1981's $1.7 million. The division also changed advertising agencies from Leber Katz Partners to Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York.

Among acquisitions, IBM paid $250 million in December, 1982, and in August, 1983, bought an additional 1.84 million shares for a 13.7% interest in technological giant Intel Corp., Santa Clara, Cal., a major supplier of vital computer parts. Analysts say this link gives IBM a crucial advantage in main frame computers and lessens its dependence on Japanese chip makers. Then in June, 1983, IBM paid $228 million for a 15% share of Rolm, also Santa Clara-based and a major producer of telecommunications equipment.

In 1982 court action, IBM was vindicated by a federal appeals court from Transamerica Corp.'s 1979 lawsuit claiming that IBM violated antitrust law by monopolizing and attempting to monopolize the market for computers and peripheral equipment. In further court action it won a ruling that prohibits three past employes and Bridge Technology, New York, from using any IBM trade secrets or proprietary or confidential business information.

A federal grand jury in California returned an indictment against Hitachi Ltd. in the well publicized IBM-FBI "Sting" operation. Still pending is IBM's civil damage suit against Hitachi.

In March, 1983, the company announced a new Corporate Management Board to replace IBM's Corporate Office and Corporate Management Committee. The new board, made up of senior corporate and operating unit executives, will have two permanent committees: the policy committee, with three members, establishes corporate goals, makes major technology, capital investment and financial decisions and is responsible for major policy issues; the business operations committee, with nine members, is responsible for business plans and for the review and approval of major product announcements and other day-to-day operations.

IBM's community involvement brought an announcement in August, 1982, that it would lend 300 computers and the programed exercises designed to teach children to read and write. Approximately 10,000 children in Washington, D.C., North Carolina, Minnesota and Florida are to participate in the program.

In October, IBM and Carnegie Mellon University in Pittsburgh signed an agreement to develop what will be the largest computer network in the world. When the "Integrated Computing Environment" goes on line in 1985, students will have instant access to some library holdings and distant data banks as vast as the U.S. Census Bureau.

Johnson & Johnson, New Brunswick, N.J., the 17th largest national advertiser, increased its U.S. advertising 38% to $270 million in 1982, a year in which many positive events at the company were overshadowed by the tragic Tylenol poisonings.

U.S. sales rose 9.2% to $3.30 billion in 1982, while earnings increased 9% before an extraordinary after-tax charge of $50 million, related to the withdrawal from the market of Tylenol capsules.

Worldwide, J&J advertising rose 14% to $307.7 million. Consolidated sales worldwide rose 6.7% to $5.76 billion, while after tax earnings before the extraordinary charge were $523.4 million, up 11.9%.

Consumer products continue to be J&J's largest business segment, representing 43% of sales and 42.4% of operating profit. U.S. sales account for 52.7% of total consumer sales. They are sold primarily through J&J Products and healthcare divisions, McNeil Consumer Products, J&J Baby Products Co., Ortho Pharmaceutical and Personal Products Co. In 1981, Tylenol alone contributed about $400 million to sales and $70 million to profits.

Professional sales contributing 33.5% represented the second-largest business segment. Pharmaceuticals contributed 19.4% and industrial sales 4.1%.

J&J is the U.S. market leader of analgesics, baby toiletries, sanitary napkins, contraceptives, adhesive bandages and other first-aid products.

The country was stunned last fall when seven people died after taking Tylenol capsules that had been filled with cyanide and replaced on retail shelves. From the day in September when the first victim died, J&J management spent a great deal of time formulating plans on bringing back the leading analgesic to the dominant position it had held.

The company immediately stopped advertising and withdrew all regular and Extra-Strength Tylenol capsules nationally, urging consumers to take tablets instead until it could introduce repackaged capsules.

For almost a month the company relied on the heavy publicity about the incident to inform the public of its actions and how to receive refunds for any Tylenol capsules. At the end of October, after a month off the air, the company ran a tv spot featuring the medical director of McNeil Consumer Products Co., the subsidiary that markets Tylenol. He discussed the trust the brand has established over the past 20 years. In January, a new campaign, "Tylenol. You can trust a good name," introduced the new tamper-resistant packaging.

By May, Tylenol had regained its dominant position in the analgesic category, once again holding more than 30% of the analgesic market, and NcNeil returned to ad themes used before the poisonings.

While the company expected the brand to regain its position, marketing experts both inside and outside J&J were surprised at the speed with which the brand bounced back. The withdrawal cost the company $100 million before taxes plus the loss of profit on lost Tylenol sales.

The Tylenol line is J&J's heaviest advertised brand. Last year $43.3 million was invested in measured media. This figure was up slightly from 1981 despite the dropping of all regular Tylenol advertising during the last quarter of 1982. Of the total, $19.5 million went into Tylenol Extra-Strength tablets and capsules, $12.3 million went into multiproduct Tylenol advertising, $6.7 million into the Tylenol children's line and $3.2 million in Tylenol sinus tablets and capsules launched nationally last fall.

Spending for other McNeil Consumer Products drugs included $8.6 million for the Co-Tylenol cold remedy line, which holds about 6% of the cough and cold remedy market, $4.3 million for Sine-Aid sinus remedy tablets and $1.6 million for Coldmax cold tablets, which moved into regional distribution last fall.

J&J also invests well over $40 million in advertising for its feminine hygiene products, which are sold under several different brand names. The company holds about 55% of the sanitary napkin market with its Stayfree, Sure & Natural, Modess and Carefree brands. Its o.b. tampon has about 12% of the tampon market.

Marketed by Personal Products Co., Stayfree received the heaviest ad support of $16.2 million in measured media, followed by Sure & Natural Maxishields, a superthin pad, $15.7 million, and Carefree pantyshields, $12.4 million. O.b. was supported by $3.5 million in 1982.

The division also markets Shower-to-Shower deodorant body powder, which received $1.3 million in measured media last year.

The leading marketer of baby toiletries sold primarily under the Johnson's name, the J&J Baby Products Co. spent close to $25 million in measured media to support baby and adult toiletries and toys last year. Heaviest dollars went into baby shampoo, supported by $7.9 million, followed by $5.8 million for baby powder; $5.2 million for baby oil; $2.6 million for cotton swabs; $1.8 million for baby lotion. Last fall, the company introduced a milder Johnson's baby bath and this year rolled out a reformulated Johnson's baby bar of synthetic cleaners to replace the 65-year-old Johnson's baby soap.

The subsidiary also increased its distribution of toys beyond direct mail into retail outlets and added several new toys in 1982. Ad spending for the line was about $1.4 million. Sundown sunscreen received $1.2 million in ad spending.

More than $20 million was invested last year in wound and oral care brands by J&J Products' healthcare and patient care divisions. Most of the ad dollars ($9.1 million) went into Band-Aid bandages, with another $5.9 million going into Reach toothbrushes.

Band-Aid dominates the adhesive bandage market in the U.S., and Reach is neck-and-neck with Oral B to lead the $170 million toothbrush market.

Other items supported by the subsidiary were Johnson's dental floss ($2.3 million), Clinicydin, Clinicaine and Clinicort ointments ($2.1 million) and A.C.T. fluoride dental rinse ($1.1 million), rolled out late last year.

Ortho Pharmaceutical, whose nonprescription products include vaginal spermicides, pregnancy test kits and an athlete's foot remedy, invested $3.6 million in measured media. Of the total, $1.9 million went into supporting Daisy 2 home pregnancy test kit. Other brands receiving support included Delfen vaginal foam, Fact pregnancy test kit and Conceptrol contraceptive gel.

Earlier this year, less than six months after the Tylenol incident, J&J recalled Zomax, a prescription painkiller, after reports of severe allergic reactions. That recall cost the company about $40 million.

S.C. Johnson & Son, Racine, Wis., the 75th largest national advertiser, increased advertising expenditures approximately 12% to $74.6 million in 1982 over 1981.

S.C. Johnson is privately held and does not reveal sales and earnings. Domestic sales, generally figured at 40% of worldwide sales, are estimated to have increased approximately 10% in 1982, to $880 million, while worldwide sales for 1982 are estimated as flat due to foreign currency translation adjustments.

Originally a marketer of wood flooring, the 117-year-old company built its reputation on floor and furniture care products and subsequently branched into insecticides, automotive and laundry products, air fresheners and other household products, and into personal care products in 1977.

Johnson spent the largest single share of its media spending in 1982—$9.6 million—on Soft Sense skin lotion. Launched in 1981 with a budget of $2.4 million. Soft Sense claims a 6.6% case share of the fast-growing hand lotion market, down from a peak of 11% in 1982.

In January, 1983, Agree shampoo and conditioner were reformulated and given new advertising and new packaging in translucent bottles. The new promotional packaging was directed at the 12-to-24 age group rather than the previous 14-to-34 target. Media expenditures in 1982 on the combined product, Agree shampoo and creme rinse conditioner, increased 73% to $1.9 million.

Market share for Agree conditioner, one of its more successful new product launches, dropped from an original one-time high of 18% to a mid-1982 share of 5%, and in mid-1983 has experienced a slight increase to a 5.8% share. Agree shampoo now holds a disappointing 2.7% case market share after a 3.5% share in May, 1982. Reflecting Johnson's determination to cut losses by reducing support on less successful brands, media spending for Agree shampoo dropped 56% to $2 million.

The three-year-old Enhance haircare treatment, an admittedly disappointing brand, was repositioned in July, 1982, when consumers were urged to "synchronize with Enhance" and advised that, "It's not just how a shampoo and conditioner works. It's when." Media spending for the combined product was up 12% to $1.5 million, but expenditures for the conditioner dropped 30% to $2.3 million. Current case market share for the conditioner is 3.5%, a slight gain over the mid-1982 share of 3%. Although the two-year-old shampoo clings to a 1.2% share of market, media spending increased 48% to $2.3 million.

The combined case market share for both conditioners decreased to a current 5.6% from 7.8% for the same period in mid-1982. The combined case share for Johnson's shampoos is down to 2.7% from 3.5% in the same mid-1982 period.

Achieve conditioning shampoo, test marketed in Tucson and Lexington, was withdrawn in May, 1982.

Edge shaving gel, continuing to hold a strong position in the men's shaving preparation category, was augmented in late 1982 by Johnson's introduction of Edge shaving gel with conditioner. While media spending for Edge gel dropped 95% to $93,000 in 1982, the $2.1 million expenditure for the shaving gel places it among the nine Johnson products with advertising budgets over $2 million. Edge jumped from a 1982 third quarter market share of 13% to a 1983 first quarter share of 22.8%. The mid-1983 dollar-based market share is down slightly to 20.2%.

In mid-1982, the National Advertising division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus (NAD) asked for substantiation of the Edge shaving gel claim that "Nothing shaves closer." Johnson proved that the signal intensity meter is commonly used to measure sound intensity and provided data to support the claim that "Edge tests show most men agree."

In floorcare, Johnson launched Clean 'N Clear in January, 1983. Slated for a $7 million introduction by Foote, Cone & Belding on tv in January and magazines in February, the new product has cleaning capabilities for no-wax floors rather than the cleaning and polishing benefits of other Johnson products. In mid-January, the account went to J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. The present dollar-based market share stands at 2.5%.

Media spending for all other floorcare products decreased: Brite dropped 52% to $1.7 million, Future was down 32% to $2.2 million and Step Saver fell 39% to $1.2 million.

Brite, after a complete restaging in 1982, increased its case market share to 15% in 1983, up from 8.5%; Step Saver has a 10.4% share of market and Future continues to hold a 20.5% share.

While Johnson holds a 53.5% case share of market in floorcare, up from 48.2% in 1982, Klear and Glo Coat continue to decline with a combined case share of 8%.

In furniture care, Johnson has a 54% combined case market share, up from 52% in 1982. Pledge, with a 29% increase in media spending—up to $5.7 million, holds its market share at 40.4%, up from 39% in 1982; Favor, with renewed measured media spending of $1.2 million, has a 7.1% share, up from 4.6% in 1982, and Complete all-purpose polishing cleaner, for the second consecutive year lost market share—down to 2.5% from 4%—and spending was reduced to $37,100 from $446,500.

Shout laundry soil and stain remover spray was dropped from the market and Shout liquid media spending was down 7% to $2.7 million. While Texize continues to dominate the market, Shout has increased its case share to 30.3% from 23% in 1982.

Off! insect repellent shows a slight case share increase in 1983, up to 79.6% from 78%. Johnson more than doubled its media budget in this category, going from $828,000 to $2 million. Two new forms of Deep Woods Off! were introduced: Maximum strength and pump-dispensed.

Increased spending for Raid products continued for the second year—up 27% to $11 million—accounting for the largest block of expeditures in Johnson's media budget. The vegetable fogger budget escalated from $154,000 to $2.2 million; house and garden bug killer was up to $1.2 million from $23,000; indoor fogger climbed 17% to $1.4 million, and insecticides jumped 63% to $1.7 million. Johnson holds a 48% case share of the insecticide market.

In September, 1982, Johnson substantiated advertising claims regarding Raid that stated "... if I use it every few weeks, ... it keeps on killing for months ... that means if I use it every month, it could kill forever." At the same time, Johnson discontinued other print ads with similar longevity claims that they deemed were possibly misleading.

In the aerosol air freshener market, Johnson dominates the category, with Glade holding a 50% case share up from 43.4% in 1982.

Glade Spinfresh, a toilet tissue holder that emits a fragrance—available in powder fresh, citrus, extra fresh and early spring scents—rolled out nationally in late spring.

Media spending for the Glade line increased on all products in 1982. Strips, tested last year in Tucson and Toledo, and budgeted at $17 million were pulled from test marketing in 1983. Glade Solid was up to $11,000 from $2,700 in 1982 and is no longer supported in 1983. Glade Spray jumped to $1.5 million from $59,900.

For most other products, in reflection of declining markets, Johnson reduced spending. The J/Wax car care line decreased 57% to $424,000; Befresh! toilet bowl freshener, after a 60% budget reduction in 1981, was removed in 1982, and Johnson fishing equipment expenditures dropped 74% to $115,000.

Johnson Creative Arts division, founded in 1981, increased spending on the Elsa Williams Needleart Collection 164% to $55,800.

Johnson continues its exploratory investigation of over-the-counter drugs. In mid-1982, Richard M. Carpenter, then executive vp-U.S. Consumer Products, said test marketing of an otc product was more than a year away.

In mid-1983, James F. Keane, formerly vp-International Consumer Products marketing and planning, was named vp-general manager of Johnson's otc drug business, and president-general manager at Rondelle Laboratories, a newly formed subsidiary that will pursue the otc business. Rodger L. DeRose, who had been manager-new business, U.S. Consumer Products, was named marketing manager-otc drug products at Rondell Laboratories.

Johnson's Worldwide Innochem Operations consist of a commercial products group that includes floorcare, cleaning and disinfecting, air care, carpet and furniture care and pesticides; and a specialty chemicals group that is made up of metal-working, special coatings, polymers and specialized chemicals for the graphic arts industry. Mr. Carpenter, moved to executive vp at Innochem, exchanged positions with S.A. Preston, who is now executive vp-U.S. Consumer Products.

In early 1983, Johnson and Needham, Harper & Steers/USA, Chicago, ended a relationship spanning more than a half century, and representing approximately $20 million in billings. The dispute erupted over a Johnson policy prohibiting its agencies from handling other clients with brands competing with any brands in a Johnson division. Specifically, Johnson was provoked by the Clorox account, acquired by Needham in late 1982,which includes Pre-Wash—the close competitor of Shout. Although NH&S did not have Shout, it did have Glade, and both brands are in Johnson's household products division. Needham only needed to resign the Glade account, but found what they termed a "recently enunciated" policy too restrictive. Johnson said the guidelines had been in effect for some time.

In March, 1983, the NH&S billings for Agree and Enhance haircare, and Glade air fresheners went to J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. Soft Sense skin lotion went to Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago.

K mart Corp., Troy, Mich., the nation's eighth largest advertiser, spent $366.1 million on advertising, a 7.4% increase from the previous year.

K mart in the process recorded its most profitable year since 1979 with $261.8 million in earnings, up 18.9%, and $16.77 billion in sales, up 1.5%, although K mart's sales performance and its ad spending fell short of estimates made last year by chairman, Bernard Fauber. Mr. Fauber predicted sales of $18 billion and ad spending of $400 million for 1982 with an eye on reaching Sears, Roebuck & Co., the nation's top retailer.

First half earnings for fiscal 1983 jumped 144% and may put K mart on target to achieve those predictions this year. K mart reported sales of $8.61 billion in the first six months of 1983, an increase of 11% from the same period in 1982. Net income of $162.3 million compared with the previous year's $66.5 million.

The category that had the most dramatic increase in ad spending last year was network tv, which increased from $12.7 million in 1981 to $37 million in 1982, due to K mart's increased tv promotion of its 20th anniversary.

K mart has dropped its frenetic pace of 200 store openings a year to 70 new stores to concentrate more on new retail concepts, particularly its new off-price brand apparel stores, called the Designer Depot. It is placing more national brand apparel in its stores and developing a new corporate image through an ad campaign assigned to Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., in February, 1983.

K mart put the Designer Depot into test last December in an old converted Kresge store in St. Clair Shores, Mich. It has five of these stores currently open in the Detroit area and plans to add 30 more elsewhere in 1983. (In May, K mart announced plans to open a Designer Depot in the Chicago market, where it has more than 60 regular stores.) By the end of 1984, it expects to have 90 in operation.

Designer Depots carry top-quality name brand and designer label merchandise at prices 20% to 70% off suggested retail. Susan McKelvey, public relations director for K mart, says shoppers at Designer Depot are more likely to be young career women who might not ordinarily shop at regular K marts. Thus, Ms. McKelvey says the retailer does not view the stores as competition for its regular discount K mart stores.

Without detracting from the commitment to this new project, chairman of the executive finance committee Robert E. Dewer says K mart is also adding more off-price lines in its regular stores. These lines are grouped in a new department called "Names for Less," appearing in certain K mart stores that are located in areas with high demographics. Mr. Dewer said, "In the long run, the addition of more national brand apparel into K mart itself is more important [than the Designer Depot]."

Added Mr. Fauber, "You could well see us advertising fewer of the so-called consumer-type items and go into a stronger style/fashion presentation that we have in the past."

Designer Depots are being advertised via run-of-press ads and four-color direct-mail brochures to the communities. For grand openings of the stores, K mart is using local radio stations. K mart announced its assignment of $10 million worth of national tv business to Campbell-Ewald in February. The agency is responsible for a corporate campaign designed to enhance the retailer's image as, among other things, "The brand name savings store," a new theme that appeared in C-E's first flight of national tv spots this spring. The old theme, "K mart is your saving place," continues to appear on print inserts prepared in-house, while longtime agency for K mart, Ross Roy Inc., is using a similar theme in radio spots. C-E is also handling retail promotions for K mart on an assignment-by-assignment basis.

Plans for Abra K Dabra, a pizza entertainment restaurant put into test markets last summer, have been put on hold because, Mr. Fauber said, "It has not performed as well as we believed it should." In a related development, Ross Roy had resigned four McDonald's regional co-op accounts which were reported worth an estimated $7 million to $8 million because of a possible conflict of interest with the Abra K Dabra restaurants.

K mart will focus more on its chain of Furr's cafeterias, planning to open 28 more mostly in the Southwest and California. Also in 1982 the retailer continued its commitment to hardware and home improvement products. It added more brand-name products and established home centers, Kitchen Korners and expanded home electronics departments in which it emphasizes personalized customer service. A prototype "HomeCare Center" in Rochester, Mich., is a precursor to 10 more units in the Detroit area and is being advertised via circulars in the Detroit papers and direct mail.

K mart has no plans to continue last year's advertising campaign for its exclusive line of Jonathan Logan sportswear and has retired agency Chalk Nissen Hanft, which handled the account. Ross Roy also has established a Toronto office to serve K mart Canada, spending for which is estimated to be $8 million to $10 million.

Kellogg Co., Battle Creek, Mich., increased its advertising expenditures 17.3% to $154.2 million, ranking it as the 43rd largest national advertiser in 1982.

In measured media advertising, spending increased by about 7%, from $97.1 million in 1981 to $104.2 million in 1982.

A long history of successful performance continued in 1982 for Kellogg, which has managed a record 38 consecutive years of higher sales, 31 years of higher earnings and 26 of higher dividends. Net sales in fiscal 1982, ended Dec. 31, were up 2% to $2.37 billion and net earnings up 11% to $228 million.

Despite this growth record, at least one Kellogg exec has described the $3 billion ready-to-eat cereal market as mature.

In this decade, annual net sales increases have continued, but at a decelerating pace. Sales increases have declined from a gain of 16% in 1980 to 8% in 1981 to the 2% of 1982.

According to the company, the decline stems from increasing sales of generic and private brands, with four out of five top generic cereals in direct competition with Kellogg products. The company's cereal market share dropped from 41% in 1979 to about 38% in fiscal 1982.

Products kicked hardest by competition from the generics and private label brands (Ralston Purina Co. reportedly produces about 90% of these) were Kellogg's corn flakes, Rice Krispies, Sugar Frosted Flakes and Raisin Bran.

In order to compete with the generics, Kellogg controlled its product prices in 1982 and continued efforts to anticipate and meet consumer needs by introducing and modifying products. In 1982 the company cut the price of the industry's biggest-selling cereal, Kellogg's Corn Flakes, by 8% and held its other cereals at 1981 prices.

In agency activity, the company moved its Most and bran cereals this summer to J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago, leaving longstanding agency Leo Burnett USA, Chicago, with only three adult cereal assignments: Special K, Product 19 and Raisins, Rice & Rye.

Kellogg, however, says it has no plans to make a distinction between an agency that handles adult vs. children's advertising.

In 1982, Kellogg also entered four test markets with Kellogg's low sodium corn flakes and Low Sodium Rice Krispies, and cut sodium chloride salt from its Most wheat-shread biscuits, replacing it with potassium chloride.

Also in 1982, Kellogg prepared for its early-1983 rollout of Crispix, a corn/rice crispy synergy in bite-size biscuits, and introduced Marshmallow Krispies, backed by $3.7 million in advertising.

This summer, the company introduced Strawberry Krispies. It also introduced Apple-Frosted Mini-Wheats and reworked the recipe of high-protein Special K to produce better taste and larger flakes. Ad spending for Special K in 1982 was $2.9 million. Product 19 was also reformulated and reintroduced this summer.

The Nutri-Grain line, backed with $8.5 million in advertising in 1982, was also reformulated.

The cereal giant did not limit new product introductions to cereals. Mrs. Smith's Frozen Foods Co., a Pottstown, Pa.-based subsidiary, introduced its Mrs. Smith's frozen quiches, crepes, Italian entrees and Mrs. Smith's Natural Juice Cherry Streusel Pie.

In addition, through its fresh food Dessert Services Group, Mrs. Smith's in 1982 brought out Mrs. Smith's Bagels, a shelf-stable item now available in the 10-state Dessert Services market area.

Another major product debut in 1982 was Whitney's yogurt, termed by Kellogg "the first premium spoonable yogurt in the United States," with chunky fruit in real juice and a price higher than its competitors. Whitney's was test marketed in Baltimore and Washington, then went into New York early in 1983 and is marketed as a companion product to Le Shake drinkable yogurt, now distributed in the Northeast. Both are produced by Kellogg's subsidiary Whitney's Foods, Battle Creek.

Kellogg's commercial foodservice industry is Fearn International, a subsidiary that produces soups, soup bases, gravies, sauces, entrees, juices and other foods under the Eggo and Le Gout labels. New for 1982-83 are low-sodium Le Gout soups, several traditional American and ethnic soups and entrees, a line of canned juice base and a line of vitamin C-enriched powdered slush mixes.

The company also introduced Eggo plain and buttermilk frozen pancake batter in 12 markets in 1983, a segment tried and abandoned by several other marketers. The main competitor in this arena is Quaker Oats' Aunt Jemima frozen pancake batter, in plain, blueberry and buttermilk.

To push harder on development of its Salada property, Kellogg in 1982 moved Salada Foods from the U.S. food products division to subsidiary status with Kellogg Co. A new line of drink mixes under the Make It Easy label is now added to this subsidiary's Salada teas, Junket rennet custards, and Easy As Pie desserts. Total Salada 1982 ad budget was $352,100, all for spot tv.

Altogether, Kellogg spent nearly $9.2 million during 1982 to advertise its noncereal products.

Operating in 19 nations around the world, Kellogg International has strong markets in Canada, the U.K. and Australia; is well underway with market development elsewhere in Europe and Latin America, and is moving into new markets in Spain and South Korea.

Kellogg Salada Canada, the oldest of the international units, introduced in 1982 a new cold remedy, Neo Citran DM, a lemon-flavored medicated drink with added cough reliever. Other international newcomers included Just Right muesli-style cereal, All-Bran with raisins and dates and a line of frozen, single-serve dinners, all in Australia.

This year, the company also formed a corporate licensing department to coordinate licensing of its famous trademarks, including Snap, Crackle, Pop and Toucan Sam, spokesbird for Fruit Loops.

The company has also invested $10 million in Agrigenetics Corp., a Denver seed company with a heavy background in plant genetics research.

Kimberly-Clark Corp., Neenah, Wis., the 83rd largest advertiser in the U.S., spent $69.3 million in advertising, an increase of 11% over 1981 expenditures.

Sales increased 3% to $3 billion in 1982. Net income, however, decreased 4% to $197.4 million from $205 million a year earlier.

The company cited two major reasons for the decline in net income—the weakness in demand for and pricing of newsprint throughout North America and the depressed earnings contribution from K-C de Mexico, S.A. de C.V. Earnings from the Mexican unit declined to $13 million from $36 million in 1981. The December, 1982, devaluation of the peso and the weakness of the Mexican economy resulted in a $9 million loss on K-C's 43% ownership vs. $11 million in earnings in the fourth quarter of 1981.

K-C products are divided into three main groups: Consumer and service, newsprint, pulp and forest products and paper specialties.

Consumer and service is the biggest group, accounting for 68% of the company's sales in 1982, up from 65% in 1981. The consumer and service group realized volume gains for most of its products, which include facial tissue, bathroom tissue, feminine pads and tampons, disposable diapers and paper towels sold worldwide under a variety of brand names. Operating profit rose 11% to a record $169 million, which offset declines outside the U.S.

The newsprint, pulp and forest products contributed 17% to K-C's sales; the paper and specialties class, 13%. The paper and specialties class operating profit rose 23% to $59 million in 1982.

In fall, 1982, the market for Depend incontinence products was expanded from five to 13 states in the Midwest, and a new undergarment was added to the product line. Depend is in 60% of the country and could be available nationally by the end of 1983. Ad support for Depend in 1982 was $1.1 million, most of it for spot tv. The brand's competition comes from Procter & Gamble's Attends.

In the disposable diaper market, K-C's Huggies had an estimated 12% share in 1982. The competition, once again, is P&G's Pampers and Luvs, with 50% and 20% shares, respectively, of the $1-billion-plus market. Ad spending for Huggies rose again in 1982, to $15.6 million—an increase of 22% over 1981.

In the category of feminine hygiene products, K-C continued to lend ad support in 1982 to the New Freedom line of products, spending a total of $14.5 million. This was a slight decrease over the 1981 total of $14.9 million.

Early in 1983, K-C introduced a New Freedom "thin" maxipad into test market in Minneapolis/St. Paul. It was no surprise that this was also the market selected by P&G to test its Always line of feminine protection products.

In April, K-C announced it was introducing the product nationally with the "largest advertising program it has ever introduced for a feminine product." The company further stated that "the thin pad segment of the maxipad market is growing faster than any other." Spending on K-C's venerable Kotex brand was $9.9 million, an increase of 1% over 1981. Kotex Security tampons, reflecting a continuing poor market for the category, received a mere $255,200 in measured ad spending in 1982.

Ad spending on K-C's Kleenex facial tissues was $8.3 million last year, an increase of 118% over expenditures for the brand in 1981. Kleenex Softique, a new extra-soft product introduced early in 1982, received ad support of $45,600.

In May, 1983, Leo Burnett USA resigned Kleenex facial tissues, Kleenex Softique facial tissues, Kleenex and Delsey bathroom tissues, Kleenex and Hi-Dri paper towels, plus the Depend incontinent briefs line and other new product.

The split occurred when Burnett learned that K-C was moving the $20 million New Freedom line to Ogilvy & Mather, New York. O&M had been handling Kotex feminine protection products and Huggies and Super Dry disposable diapers.

According to Burnett, the loss of New Freedom precluded "our continuing to work with Kimberly-Clark." When the dust settled, Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, was given about $15 million worth of consumer tissue products, especially the Kleenex brand.

Campbell-Mithun, Minneapolis, was assigned the Depend brand with estimated billings of $5 million. K-C moved Kotex Lightdays pantyliners to Tatham-Laird & Kudner, Chicago, from O&M.

Loews Corp., New York, the nation's 60th largest advertiser, reduced its ad budget an estimated 27% in 1982 to $103.3 million. Sales fell 0.6%, to $4.75 billion, while net income dropped 14.8%, to $215.8 million. Income from continuing operations also fell, by 16.4%, to $221 million. These results, which the company attributed to "difficult economic conditions and the state of competition in the marketplace," ended a five-year streak of consecutive gains in revenues and operating income.

The market realities the company faces are best exemplified by its Lorillard division, which achieved record sales and earnings for the seventh year despite a decline in its share of the cigaret market to 8.8% from 9.3% in 1981. Revenue rose 5.8% in 1982, to $1.17 billion, while the division's contribution to corporate income rose 28.5%, to just under $229 million.

Lorillard has spent the past year at a familiar task, bolstering its share of the low-tar cigaret market. A pioneer in the category, the company has since lagged behind its rivals in developing successful new brands and increasing sales of existing low-tar entries.

A restaging of the brand family strategy for Kent, the company's largest line, made its debut in June. The Kent name was reattached to the Golden Lights brand, which saw its sales decline after losing the Kent designation in 1978. That brand, as well as Kent and Kent III, now carry standardized logos.

Foote, Cone & Belding, New York, handles the estimated $25-million Kent account, which it held onto after a creative review in June, 1982, pitting it against Dancer Fitzgerald Sample. As consolation, DFS was awarded the $15 million to $20 million True and smokeless tobacco accounts, which moved in August, 1982, from D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius.

A new 100mm brand, Satin, with 10 mg tar, was introduced nationally in January after achieving a 1% market share—worth $160 million on a national basis—during a six-month test. The product, aimed at women, has a marketing budget for 1983 estimated at $75 million. Lorillard calls Satin, which comes in regular and menthol, "the most aggressive new product launch in its history." It's handled by MCA Advertising, New York, which also handles Newport, Lorillard's only brand to show growth in 1982. In trade ads, MCA projects Satin's national retail sales as topping $250 million.

As of last Jan. 1, Lorillard consolidated all its print media buying in-house. FCB previously handled the estimated $90 million in newspaper and magazine placement.

Various cigaret brands that were in test in 1981—Bistro, Heritage, Maverick and Rebel—have been discontinued.

Newport, as noted, was the only Lorillard brand to boost its market share in 1982, to 2.5% from 2.3%. Sales rose 9.4%, to 15.4 billion. MCA Advertising calls Newport "the fastest growing established cigaret brand." Ad spending in magazines and outdoor totaled $14.9 million, up 25.6% from 1981.

Kent, Lorillard's No. 1 product line, suffered a market share decline to 4.2% from 4.6%, as sales fell 8.8%, to 25.8 billion. Ad spending, in magazines, newspaper supplements and outdoor, soared 64.6%, to $21.4 million.

The market share for True dropped to 1.5% from 1.6%, as sales dropped 8%, to 9.1 billion. Spending in magazines, newspaper supplements and outdoor rose 7.5%, to $11.2 million.

Triumph, a 3mg brand introduced in 1979, suffered a serious slide in both market share (from 0.4% to 0.2%) and sales (down 45.4%, to 1.2 billion). Ad spending, which in 1981 totaled $12.6 million in magazines, newspaper supplements and outdoor, plunged to just $100 in outdoor.

Among the smaller brands, Old Gold's market share was flat at 0.3%, while sales fell 10.5%, to 1.88 billion. Spending in outdoor only totaled $3,300. The market share of Max stayed at 0.1%, as sales dropped 8%. Spending in magazines and outdoor totaled $600,100. Spring remained at a minuscule 0.01% of the market, as sales dropped 14.3%, to 0.06 billion. There was no ad spending in measured media. In addition to its cigaret brands, Lorillard also markets several smokeless tobaccos. They were supported with $2.2 million in measured ad spending.

In other Loews divisions, Loews Hotels achieved what the company called "excellent results . . . despite the troubled economy and a soft travel year." Revenues were $161.4 million, down 32.8% from 1981. Contribution to corporate income also fell, by 67%, to $33.6 million.

Despite these results, the division continues work on a variety of projects. A hotel and casino were opened on the French Riviera. Construction has begun on a hotel and resort in Paradise Valley, Ariz., and a suburban motel, the company's first, in Teaneck, N.J. And a major expansion of the Anatole Hotel in Dallas is under way.

Last year was another record year for Loews Theatres, as revenues rose 7.1%, to $64.2 million, and income contribution rose 12.1%, to $14.5 million. The division opened 17 theaters in three complexes, with construction proceeding on an additional 14 theaters in two complexes.

The CNA Financial division, made gains in spite of "one of the most difficult years the insurance industry has experienced," according to Loews. Revenues rose 0.7%, to $3.2 billion, though income contribution fell 22%, to $107.9 million.

General Finance, which handles consumer finance, saw its debt and portfolio positions restructured to reduce short-term debt.

Bulova Watch Co. "made substantial progress in its revitalization program," Loews said, but still incurred losses because of an oversupply of product and stepped-up overseas competition. Revenues dropped 15.8%, to $151.2 million. Where there was income contribution of $4.7 million in 1981, there was a loss last year of $17.4 million.

Bulova made its move to reach young consumers with a new tv and magazine ad campaign featuring famous faces, among them Muhammad Ali, Roger Daltry and Bernadette Peters, touting Bulova's famous faces. The division debuted a line of men's watches called Milennia, via a tie with ETA SA Fabrique D'Ebauches of Switzerland. The Caravelle line of lower-price watches was redesigned, to favorable retailer response. Ad spending for Bulova rose about 9%, to $3.2 million.

MCA Inc., Universal City, Cal., the 70th largest advertiser, increased ad spending 26% in 1982 to an estimated $80.1 million.

The parent company of Universal Pictures reported sharply increased revenues and profits as it basked in the warm afterglow of "E. T.—The Extra-Terrestrial," a summer, 1982, release that surpassed "Star Wars" as all-time movie box office champion. MCA reported revenues of $1.6 billion in fiscal 1982 (calendar year), a 19% increase from the $1.3 billion recorded in 1981. Net income soared 96% to $176.2 million, from $89.8 million a year earlier. "E.T." has grossed $360 million domestically and its foreign gross is estimated at about $250 million.

Increased ad spending, despite the general recession, is largely a result of supporting more hit movies that enjoy long, successful runs.

As a result, substantial fluctuations in media spending year to year are normal in the film industry. MCA itself recorded a 14% ad spending decline in 1981, partly because of a lackluster crop of films.

The "E.T" bonanza prompted a two-for-one stock split in January, 1983. The heartwarming saga of a lost space visitor helped push investment income (cash and short-term investments) for MCA—traditionally cash rich and carrying little long-term debt—to $400.1 million at the end of fiscal 1982, compared to $188.1 million the year before.

In other ventures, real-estate development valued at $200 million is underway at the 420-acre Universal Studios film lot, a site adjacent to Hollywood and valued at more than $1 billion, where MCA is headquartered. An internal reorganization separating the real estate from other operations was initiated in March, 1982, prompting speculation that MCA may eventually create a new company to hold the valuable real estate.

In July, 1982, MCA spun off its Columbia Financial Corp. subsidiary, ridding itself of the Denver-based savings and loan that proved to be a drain when high interest rates sent the entire s&l industry into hard times.

In other operations, MCA TV's barter syndication activities continued to grow. Universal Television, however, traditionally the leader in supplying the three commercial networks prime time series, slipped several notches in early 1983.

In theatrical film operations, "E.T." powered Universal Pictures to a 30% market share in 1982, best in the film industry. "On Golden Pond," the Best Picture Academy Award winner of 1981 that racked up much of its business in 1982, and "The Best Little Whorehouse in Texas," to a lesser extent, contributed to Universal Pictures' dominance as well. (Universal Pictures is unlikely to duplicate that feat in 1983 because rival studios, with sequels to blockbusters like "Star Wars" and "Superman," figure to sweep ahead.)

Theatrical revenues, part of MCA's filmed entertainment division, reached $608.8 million in 1982, a 94% increase from the $313.3 million raked in the year before.

The theatrical division was the biggest contributor to the filmed entertainment division, which in 1982 chalked up $1 billion, 29% more than the $788.7 reported in 1981. The "E.T." glow was most apparent in filmed entertainment operating income (profits before taxes and other expenses), which nearly tripled to $212.0 million, vs. $72.0 million in 1981.

Robert Rehme, theatrical distribution and marketing division president, took command of Universal Pictures in December, 1982, when he was appointed president of the Theatrical Motion Picture Group, a new post.

One month earlier, Charles O. Glenn, a veteran movie advertising executive, joined as exec vp-advertising, publicity and promotion. Mr. Glenn succeeded David Weitzner, who took a top post at Embassy Pictures. Doyle Dane Bernbach, the agency that followed Mr. Weitzner from 20th Century Fox-Pictures, is Universal's agency for national media; movie advertising represents the lion's share of MCA's advertising.

About $4.4 million was spent in network tv commercials to support "On Golden Pond," touting its Oscar for Best Picture. "E.T," with $2.7 million and "Conan, the Barbarian," with $2.1 million were next in line with measured network tv ad campaigns, according to LNA.

MCA, despite being cash-rich historically, has in recent years relied increasingly on others to help finance its motion pictures. Among the co-producers or companies producing films that Universal distributes are the British-backed Associated Film Distribution ("On Golden Pond"), Lorimar Productions, Oak Industries ("Psycho II"), producer Dino de Laurentiis ("Conan") and RKO-General.

Universal Television, the production arm, has traditionally been Hollywood's single leading supplier to the three commercial tv networks of series programing, but slipped from its perch. It remains among the leaders, however, with five hours on the three networks' fall premiere schedule. In its heyday, it produced 10 hours or more.

CBS-TV bought "Magnum, P. I.," "Simon and Simon" and a new series, "Whiz Kids." NBC-TV takes "Knight Rider" and "A Team." In addition, CBS-TV has ordered a limited series that will come on later in the season, "Domestic Life," a sitcom starring Martin Mull.

Universal's staples traditionally have been hourlong dramatic series and action programs, which sell well overseas, where MCA TV has a strong presence in distribution.

MCA's pay tv distribution arm, in a ground-breaking first during February, 1983, offered the film "Pirates of Penzance" on a pay-per-view tv basis for $10 per home the same day it premiered in movie theaters. The ppv showing, which angered theater operators, only achieved a 10% penetration rate in about 1.4 million ppv homes.

Also part of filmed entertainment operations is Recreational Services, consisting primarily of the Universal Studios Tour, a major Southern California theme park and the New Universal Amphitheatre.

Another component of Recreational Services is Yosemite Park and Curry Co., concessionaire at the famous National Park located in central California. The agency for the $5 million Recreational Services account is FCB/Entertainment, Los Angeles, which replaced Abert, Newhoff & Burr in October, 1982. Most of the division's ad budget promotes the studio tour in Southern California.

Also reported as part of filmed entertainment is MCA's partnership in USA Cable Network, a successful advertiser-supported basic cable network. Home Box Office, the Time Inc. subsidiary, and Paramount Pictures, the Gulf & Western subsidiary, are MCA's partners in the cable tv network and have expressed interest in jointly mounting other cable tv program ventures, including a pay-per-view service.

MCA's next largest operating unit, after filmed entertainment, is Spencer Gifts, Atlantic City, N.J., which is a retail and mail-order company. Spencer Gifts retail operations, 435 stores, suffered declining margins despite slightly higher sales. Mail-order operations, however, had a record year for revenues and profits.

MCA's third-largest operating unit, records and music publishing, posted a slight decline in revenues and profits in 1982. Revenues of $165.9 million were down 5% from the $175.2 million a year ago. Operating income slid 4% to $24.2 million, compared to $25.2 million in 1981. However, its profit margin is considered excellent by music industry standards.

In what was a major coup, MCA brought aboard Irving Azoff, a leading rock group manager and movie producer, as president of MCA Records Group in April, 1983. Mr. Azoff, whose Front Line Management handled The Eagles, Chicago, Christopher Cross and others, is expected to broaden MCA's roster of artists and could possibly exert influence beyond MCA's music operations because of his broad background.

Eugene L. Froelich, corporate group vp-records, was reassigned to other corporate duties to make way for Mr. Azoff. Bob Siner, MCA's second ranking record executive, departed shortly after Mr. Azoff arrived.

MCA recently bought Grosset & Dunlap, Ace and Playboy mass-market paperbacks, acquisitions that help lift revenues. It also recorded brisk sales from books and other printed items licensed from "E.T."

MCA was also one of three major movie studio partners in a five-company joint venture that proposed to take over Showtime and The Movie Channel pay cable networks. However, the Justice Department opposed the plan initially.

MCA and Walt Disney Productions are plaintiffs in the Sony Betamax lawsuit over home videotaping of copyrighted programs that is before the Supreme Court.

Mars Inc., the nation's 54th largest advertiser, posted a hefty increase in 1982 ad spending, a leap that sent the companywide total climbing 53% to an estimated $120 million. Ad spending at Mars' Kal Kan Foods unit was up about 65%, and the jump at its Uncle Ben's Foods was about 40%.

KNOW THY COMPETITION

The real engine behind the year's advertising surge, after a decline in 1981, was the 50% increase in ad spending support for Mars' candy and snack brands. That accounted for $21 million of the estimated $35 million increase in measured media in 1982.

U.S. sales last year, up an estimated 10.4% to $1.49 billion, reflect Mars' continued, determined effort to build share in the chocolate bar/snack market, sales gains in its pet food lines, particularly with Crave, its dry cat food, which is expanding to more markets. U.S. dried rice sales, industrywide, were flat to lower last year, and this is believed to have limited sales gains in Mars' U.S. rice business.

The company's widespread international operations put Mars candy and pet food brands at or near the top of the heap in Europe and elsewhere. Global sales figures, including U.S. results, are imprecise. Estimates range up to $3 billion or more annually.

Mars, one of the largest privately held companies in the world, remains one of the most secretive of giant corporations. It does not release any sales or advertising figures and only rarely talks about its marketing and advertising strategies and goals.

What's plain from two years of aggressive behavior in the U.S. candy market—juggling price increases and price cuts, bigger and smaller candy bar sizes, spurts of heavy ad activity—is Mars' hunger for a larger share of market. U.S. chocolate candy bar and "panned" goods (M&M's) sales are estimated at $2.6 billion. Building from the 33% share observers credited to Mars in 1980, the company is now believed to hold a 40% to 50% share of market. For the year, AA estimates Mars candy and snack sales at a little more than $1 million, up about 10% from a year ago.

The M&M/Mars unit has one new candy bar in test this year, "Applause" caramel apple crunch bar, and various other new product ideas are on the drawing board. Other recently introduced candy products that received significantly greater ad support last year were Royals mint chocolates and Skittles bite-size candies.

Mars is also continuing its bid to break into the hotly competitive U.S. snack market through its Snack-Master unit, based in Georgia. It is following up on last year's launch of Combos, a cheese-filled pretzel nugget, with a new filled snack product, still in test markets, called Corn-Quistos.

While the snack field still holds powerful attraction for Mars, the company has pulled the plug on an effort to establish itself in the frozen foods field through Uncle Ben's Foods. It closed its Uncle Ben's Frozen Foods unit, in St. Charles, Ill., and two test products, SunCrisps, a frozen french fry made from rice, and Heat 'n Serve frozen rice dishes disappeared from the market.

Uncle Ben's converted brand rice is still believed to be the top selling dried rice brand in the U.S., although Colgate-Palmolive, through its Riviana unit brands, is believed to be the industry sales leader. While withdrawing from frozen foods, Mars sharply boosted ad spending for Uncle Ben's converted rice. AA estimates sales last year for the rice unit were about $157 million, up 5% from the previous year.

In pet foods, Mars trails well behind Ralston-Purina and other market leaders in total dollar sales despite successes in European markets. Its traditional strength has been in the canned dog and cat food segments, where analyst John Maxwell ranks Kal Kan dog food second to GrandMet's Alpo and Kal Kan cat food, third behind Heinz' 9-Lives and Carnation's Friskies Buffet.

Mars' entry into the big dry dog food category, Mealtime, ranks sixth in Mr. Maxwell's ratings, falling slightly behind fifth ranked Cycle, from General Foods, in 1982. Crave, the company's dry cat food, expanded rapidly into new markets supported by heavy advertising last year and climbed into fifth place in Mr. Maxwell's rankings for the category.

With all its brands believed to have increased dollar sales in 1982, and with Crave enjoying particularly big percentage gains, AA estimates Mars U.S. pet food sales for the year at about $282 million, up 34%. Estimated measured media spending for major Mars brands last year was:

- Candy and snacks—Snickers, $16.3 million, up 111%; M&M's, $9.5 million, up 69%; Three Musketeers, $6.8 million, up 48%; Twix, $6.7 million, up 17%; Milky Way, $6.6 million, up 46%; Mars bars, $5.6 million, up 5%; Starburst, $3.6 million, up 47%; Summit, $3.2 million, off 15%; Combos, $2.7 million, up 389%; Royals, $1.1 million, up 243%; and Skittles, $1.1 million, up 351%.
- Pet foods—Crave dry cat food, $9.4 million, up 824%; Kal Kan canned dog food, $5.2 million, up 17%; Mealtime dry dog food, $4.9 million, up 11%; Kal Kan canned cat food, $4.8 million, up 18%.
- Rice products—Uncle Ben's rice, $9.7 million, up 50%.

Mattel Inc., Hawthorne, Cal., increased ad spending 97% to an estimated $217.9 million in 1982, making it the 28th largest U. S. advertiser.

The whopping ad spending increase came from stepped-up efforts to market videogame products in Mattel's now beleaguered electronics division. Network spending alone soared to $61 million from $26 million the year before, a 135% increase.

Yet Mattel Electronics, once the darling division of the company for its ability to make fat profits in marketing the Intellivision programable videogame, has fallen on hard times, reporting huge losses in early 1983.

The division posted a $28.1 million loss in the fourth quarter of its fiscal 1983 ended Jan. 29, 1983, compared with a $45.1 million operating profit for the same period a year earlier. For the first quarter of fiscal 1984 ended April 30, the electronics unit showed a $34.4 million loss, compared with a $25.3 million operating profit for the comparable period a year earlier.

The electronics division losses dragged total corporate net income into the red for both those quarters. Then in August, faced with a pretax loss of "significantly more than $100 million" for the first half of 1983, Mattel added 400 more white-collar employes to 260 already laid off in its electronics division, raising the specter that Mattel may be forced to close the division which accounted for $555.6 million of Mattel's $1.34 billion in sales and $67 million of its $130.1 million pretax operating profit in fiscal 1983.

But major losses in 1983 overshadow the improved performance of fiscal 1983. Intellivision, first introduced in 1980, is now being preempted by ColecoVision and the second generation Atari 5200 introduced in late 1982.

Intellivision holds less than a 15% market share, a share that is continuing to shrink, analysts estimate. In all, 3.5 million Intellivision units have been sold since its introduction. Intense competition forced Mattel to cut Intellivision's price to about $100 retail, compared with $230 or more in its heyday.

Compounding the troubles, the videogame market began to merge with the low-end home computer market (the computers offer videogame play) and Mattel was slow to introduce new products. Its first home computer, Aquarius, is being rolled out in late 1983.

Mattel originally estimated that the basic Aquarius unit would retail for about $200, but slashed the price to under $100 because of competition from Commodore International, Texas Instruments and others.

The complete four-piece Aquarius system, including a thermal printer, miniexpander game player and data recorder accesories, is to retail for $350 to $400.

"Mattel has been a day late and a dollar short for a while," Greg Kieselmann, an analyst at Bateman Eichler, Hill Richards, Los Angeles, said in an interview.

To spur sales, Mattel offered a 13-in. color tv with purchases of the complete Aquarius system (for an additional $99) and Intellivision (for an additional $75).

In 1982, Mattel Electronics began marketing videogame cartridges compatible with the Atari 2600, the most popular videogame system. But Mattel eventually advertised a three-for-the-price-of-two offer to clear out high inventories.

Mattel plans to offer software for IBM and Apple computers soon, a spokeswoman said.

Mattel Electronics also launched Synsonics Drums, an electronic drum instrument, sold out in 1982. Its success prompted Mattel to offer a second drum product in 1983.

After losses mounted, a new management team took over Mattel Electronics in July, 1983.

William Mack Morris, whose background was in soft goods marketing before joining Mattel, was named electronics division president. Mr. Morris, who was president of Mattel's diversified companies division, succeeded Joshua Denham, who resigned but remains a consultant. Terrence E. Svaleski, a marketing consultant, was appointed senior vp-marketing and sales.

While electronics, a division whose revenues represented 41% of fiscal year sales, is troubled, the picture is much brighter in the toy and hobby products division, which accounts for 39% of sales.

The division's revenues of $528 million were 14% higher than the year before, which is impressive considering that toy industry sales as a whole declined 5%, though it remains profitable.

Mattel, which sells about 500 toy products, holds a 10.5% market share in the U. S. and 3% in the world, according to the company. This is for traditional, nonelectronic toy products. Mattel bills itself as the world's largest single-unit toy manufacturer, although General Mills can be considered larger when all its various toy operations are added together.

Barbie dolls, first introduced in 1959, set new sales records and continued as the flagship toy line. Two other toy product lines are being adapted into animated tv series, an indication of strong market acceptance.

He Man, Masters of the Universe—a line of eight action play figures created in-house by Mattel Toys—is being launched in a joint tv syndication venture with Group W Productions (65 half-hours will be produced). ABC Television Network, meanwhile, will adapt the Monchichi line of smiling, monkey-like characters for a Saturday morning animated series. Both tv series will make their debut in fall, 1983. Mattel Licensing Corp. was established in November, 1982, to foster other licensing and merchandising arrangements. A perennial favorite, Hot Wheels miniature die-cast cars, and the pre-school Children's Discovery line were also brisk sellers.

Mattel's next largest division is publishing and printing, consisting largely of Western Publishing, Racine, Wis. Its revenues of $246 million (representing 18% of Mattel's total revenues) decreased 11%.

Western Publishing, best known for its Golden Books and Whitman line, posted a $2.4 million loss for the fiscal year, compared with a $10.5 million operating profit the year before. The loss included a $7.5 million writeoff for plant closings and consolidation aimed at restoring profitability in the future. In an agency move, Western Publishing replaced MCA Advertising, New York, with Ogilvy & Mather, Chicago, and Kobs & Brady, Chicago.

In March, 1982, Mattel sold its Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Combined Shows for $22.8 million to the management. Mattel bought the circus show for $50 million in stock in 1971, but it proved to be a drain. On the other hand, Mattel retained Circus World Theme Park in Florida, a small, money-losing operation.

In 1982, Mattel test-marketed People Protection Products, a line of safety products retailing from $10 to $80, supported by ads featuring "Hill Street Blues" star Michael Conrad. Though the test marketing was not a success, resulting in a loss amounting to several million dollars, the line may be revamped and reintroduced.

The company also established Mattel Direct Marketing in December, 1982, as a new unit.

Mazda Motors of America Inc. (Central), Rancho Dominguez, Cal., was the 82nd largest national advertiser in 1982. The company boosted its ad spending a hefty 73.5% to $70.5 million from expenditures of $40.6 million in 1981. The company is a joint venture of Toyo Kogyo Co. Ltd. and Sumitomo Corp. and Mazda Motors of America (East) Jacksonville, Fla., itself a subsidiary of the C. Itoh Co. A marketer of automobiles and trucks, and fourth-largest Japanese auto importer in the U.S., Mazda had its best year ever in this country, with sales of 204,155 units, including 41,005 trucks and 163,150 cars. This represented a 11.6% increase over the 182,885 total units sold in 1981.

The end of the year found the company with a 2.1% share of the total U.S. market, up from 1.8% in 1981, and with 7.5% of total import registrations, up from 6.2% a year earlier.

Mazda cars and trucks are imported on both East and West Coasts. From the West, Mazda Motors of America (Central) supplies cars to four distributors that service more than 500 dealers in the Pacific Northwest, Great Lakes and Gulf regions. Mazda East, located in Jacksonville, Fla., serves more than 250 dealers in 18 eastern and southeastern states and the District of Columbia. Worldwide unit sales of the parent Toyo Kogyo, Hiroshima, Japan, were down 4.3% from fiscal 1981, first decrease in factory unit sales since 1975, but the company still managed to post record revenues and income for the seventh straight year. Net income was $91.4 million, an increase of 27.5% over 1981.

Network and spot tv and continued use of auto enthusiast magazines and national newsweeklies were the media mainstays behind the introduction of Mazda's 1983 model line. Tv and print ads kept up the price/value theme of previous years, but for 1983 they also stressed "outstanding total performance" of the entire Mazda line.

Heavy emphasis was placed on the debut of the all-new front-wheel drive 626, the company's international mid-size vehicle, which got added impact when it was named 1983 Import Car of the Year by Motor Trend magazine. The 626 also was named 1982-83 Japanese Car of the Year.

Mazda continued its sponsorship of football and basketball events with participation in the televised games of the NCAA, NBA and NFL. Once again in January, the company was a sponsor of the Super Bowl, and it also renewed its sponsorship of USA Cable Network's "Sports Look" series for the remainder of 1983. Mazda also signed on as a major sponsor, for the sixth straight year, of "NFL Week in Review" and "NFL Weekly Magazine," two barter-syndicated series from Pro Sports Entertainment.

The company also sponsored the $200,000 Mazda Japan Classic, the final event in its 34-tournament series for lady professional golfers (LPGA), and continued its involvement in auto racing. In the U.S., the Mazda RX-7 high performance rotary engine sports car won important races at Daytona and Atlanta and other events overseas. The RX-7, top-selling two-seat sports car in the U.S., posted sales of 50,062 units in 1982, up from 43,418 units the previous year, but still behind the 58,740 units of the popular 626, Mazda's best-selling car last year.

The GLC (Great Little Car) economy cars had the support of the company's multimedia advertising effort. The GLC was offered in front-wheel drive, three-door hatchback and four-door sedan models, boasted 50 mpg highway mileage and 36 mpg in the city, and carried a base sticker price of $5,695. The print campaign supporting GLC called it "the one economy car that lets you forget about economy." Two 30-second tv spots, set to the theme, "The more you look," focused on the roominess and standard features of the GLC base and custom models.

The year saw the biggest expenditure ever made for the promotion of Mazda's pickup trucks, the B2000 gasoline engine vehicle and the B2200 diesel model. In mid-1982, the company started tv advertising announcing price reductions on its B2000 to $5,795, a move in a small-truck price war between Mazda and Japanese competitors Nissan, Toyota, Isuzu and Mitsubishi and U.S.-made products from Chevrolet and Ford.

In the fall, Mazda also launched a major network tv effort, a "weekend" promotion strategy heavily weighted with NCAA football on CBS-TV and, on the conclusion of the National Football League players' strike, of NFL football on NBC-TV. This also included the use of 30-second spots on CBS' "Sixty Minutes" and the ABC and NBC Sunday night movies, as well as the use of newsweeklies and other national consumer magazines. For Mazda, this fourth-quarter strategy translated into sales of 41,005 pickup trucks for the year.

The last fiscal year—Oct. 17, 1982, to be exact—Mazda made the long-awaited move into its new manufacturing plant located in the city of Hofu. The plant includes a central office and four surrounding shops: Stamping, body assembly, painting and final assembly. It currently employs 1,800 workers and has a planned monthly production of 20,000 completed units and knockdown (CKD) units for export and assembly elsewhere.

McDonald's systemwide sales rose 10% in 1982 to $7.8 billion. In contrast, 1981's systemwide sales total of $7.13 billion was 15% more than the previous year's total. The smaller 1982 increase reflects the recessionary pressures that kept growth for the total fast-food industry below McDonald's performance. The company's net income in 1982 of $301 million was 14% more than 1981's $265 million, but also represented a smaller increase than had been reported in 1981 (20%). Still, McDonald's remained the fast-food industry's largest chain, with total sales only slightly less than those of its next four largest competitors combined.

Total sales for the 1,341 McDonald's units outside the U.S. rose to $1.45 billion in 1982, amounting to 19% of systemwide sales.

McDonald's growth strategy has been to add 500 restaurants to its system annually. It exceeded that goal in 1982, adding 520. At the end of the year, 7,259 McDonald's were in operation: In the U.S., 5,918, and 1,341 in 30 foreign countries and territories. Company officials remained confident it can stick to the 500-per-year growth rate for at least the next decade.

Much of that growth should continue to occur overseas. In 1982, McDonald's opened its 500th restaurant in the Pacific, its 400th in Canada and its first in Malaysia. The 350th store in western Europe opened early in 1983, and management told stockholders to expect the opening of two McDonald's in Yugoslavia in 1984.

Accustomed to being a marketing innovator, McDonald's was forced into the role of reactor and put on the defensive frequently in 1982. On Sept. 27, the No. 2 hamburger chain, Pillsbury's Burger King, launched a massive comparative campaign claiming its Whopper beat the Big Mac and Wendy's single hamburger in consumer taste tests. Other spots in the campaign claimed that McDonald's and Wendy's fry their hamburgers while Burger King broils its burgers. Still other spots claimed McDonald's hamburger contained 20% less meat than Burger King's (without mentioning, McDonald's claimed, that Burger King's product was more expensive).

Even before the campaign aired, McDonald's was in a Miami U.S. district court seeking a restraining order against use of the tv spots. Charging that the advertising was "false and misleading," McDonald's asserted that its product was not prepared as conveyed in the spots. Further, it charged that no mention was made that "Burger King burgers are often steamed and then reheated or warmed in microwave ovens before sales to consumers." The injunction ultimately was denied.

On Oct. 29, all three parties reached an out-of-court settlement on the matter under which Burger King agreed to phase out the campaign. But while the spots referring to Wendy's did disappear, the "Whopper beat the Big Mac" commercials continued to run until the end of the year. Subcampaigns for Burger King included a "video coupon" and a spot giving Christmas greetings from Burger King to McDonald's.

Burger King's advertising attack on McDonald's market share caught the No. 1 chain at a vulnerable time. McDonald's ad awareness level as measured by ADVERTISING AGE's ad-Watch survey steadily declined during the summer (from being named most memorable fast-food advertiser by 49.2% in June to 39.9% in August), but recovered slightly to 45.6% in September. In October, after the Battle of the Burgers began, McDonald's rating dipped to 35.6%. Burger King's awareness level, below 10% throughout the summer, soared to 24.1% in October.

But even while the battle raged, sales for all three of the combatants rose. The bottom line to the controversy was that it raised awareness for the whole category.

The Battle of the Burgers was only the most widely publicized part of another busy marketing year for McDonald's. The company continued its traditional mix of a heavy network and local tv presence with in-store promotions.

The first 1982 creative from Leo Burnett USA, which replaced Needham, Harper & Steers as national agency in October, 1981, continued the "You deserve a break" theme NH&S had revived before the agency change. New spots in the spring maintained the "slice-of-life" ad style McDonald's has perfected.

Advertising focusing on brand loyalty—what the company calls the "McDonald's experience"—continued throughout the year. Even when the theme became "Together, McDonald's & You" early in 1983, the "food, folks and fun" message remained the same. The focus narrowed more in the spring and summer of 1983, when increasing competition pushed McDonald's to a stronger emphasis on its menu offerings.

The promotion lineup featured the stamp-saver "Quality in the bag" game in the spring of 1982, and the "Taste the thrill of Atari" scratch-card game in the fall. For children there was a series of "Happy Meal" promotions that offered such educational premiums as Little Golden Books. A Playmobile toy premium offer was withdrawn after concerns were voiced about safety.

McDonald's changed its promotion strategy in the first half of 1983, conducting a series of regional games and sweepstakes in selected markets instead of nationally. That allowed the company to concentrate network marketing dollars on blunting the impact of continuing ad assaults by Burger King and Wendy's. The "Camp Snoopy" glass premium promotion in July, 1983, was the company's first real national promotional effort this year.

The company surprised the marketing community late in July when it unveiled corporate-image commercials featuring actor John Houseman as its first advertising spokesman.

Some problems continued to surface with McDonald's new menu products. By yearend, it was clear McNuggets were a success, McChicken was in trouble. The sandwich was gone from all units by early 1983, a second new-product misfire for McDonald's, which pulled its Chopped Beefsteak sandwich from the market in 1981.

A third possible member of that list is the McRib sandwich, launched in June, 1981, with mixed results. At the company's 1983 stockholders meeting, chief operations officer Edward Rensi said the jury was still out on McRib, but by mid-summer the product's future looked bleak.

Undaunted by this shaky new-product performance, McDonald's in July began testing a croissant variation of its Egg McMuffin (one of its most successful new products of the past). Initially tested in Rockford, Ill., the croissant sandwich was positioned as a lunch rather than breakfast item.

McDonald's continued its financial strategy of reinvesting profits in existing operations. In 1982, 240 operating stores and 371 new stores were given drive-thru windows, bringing to 5,093 (or 85% of freestanding units) the number with drive-thrus. An additional 554 McDonald's Playland facilities for children were added in 1982. Both the drive-thrus (which account for an average 40% of sales where included) and the Playlands have proven to be successful sales boosters for the chain.

Two of McDonald's top marketing personnel left the company in the past year. Roy Bergold, who served as assistant vp-advertising, joined the creative department of McDonald's agency, Leo Burnett USA, in June, 1983, after earlier indicating he would be joining Needham, Harper & Steers, the chain's previous agency. He was succeeded by Richard Starmann.

Commmunications vp Raymond Caruso left McDonald's in December, 1982. This past March he joined the Red Lobster restaurant chain as vp-marketing.

Miles Laboratories, Elkhart, Ind., a subsidiary of Bayer AG of Leverkusen, West Germany, was the 77th largest advertiser in 1982, spending an estimated $73.2 million on advertising, a slight increase over 1981's total of $72 million.

In 1982, sales rose by 4% over 1981 to $1.076 billion. The company, however, experienced a net loss of $800,000 due in part to discontinued operations.

As a result of a merger with another Bayer AG property, Cutter Laboratories, in January, Miles now markets products through five operating groups: Miles consumer products group, Miles professional products group, Miles biotechnology group, Miles pharmaceuticals and the Cutter group. Miles disposed of Worthington Foods and Morningstar Farms during the year.

The consumer products group is composed of the consumer healthcare and household products division. Miles markets children's and adult's vitamins under the brand names One-A-Day, Flintstones and Bugs Bunny. Alka-Seltzer, Alka-Seltzer Plus, Alka-2, Bactine and Miles Nervine are the company's home health remedies.

Among these products, measured media support for Alka-Seltzer declined 20.8% to $12.8 million. Alka-Seltzer Plus cold tablets increased 14.4% to $5.6 million.

Advertising for Bactine hydrocortisone cream, devoted strictly to network tv, rose 15% to $1.27 million.

In keeping with the general mood of expansion, the company introduced "Enriched singles" and Vitapace—a two-layered product to deliver B complex and C vitamins. To consolidate the nationally advertised Miles vitamin brands, all One-A-Day advertising was shifted from J. Walter Thompson USA in New York to Chicago-based Tatham-Laird & Kudner, which has been handling Bugs Bunny and Flintstones vitamins.

In January, Rexall launched Pac-Man children's multivitamins with the ad theme: "Goodbye Fred, hello Pac-Man," a direct reference to Miles' Flintstones vitamins, which claim more than 30% of the $80 million category. Flintstones responded by introducing Flintstones Complete vitamins, with iron, calcium and minerals. The plan, which began last February, included a $4.5 million budget for daytime and prime time tv. Couponing was included in the plan.

In addition, Miles followed through on its plan to spend $10 million promoting vitamins in 1982. Advertising for One-A-Day vitamins increased 68% to $10.5 million, its network tv ad spending almost doubling.

The household products division encompasses S.O.S cleaning products and Cutter insect repellents. In January, the former Cutter Consumer Products Group was merged into Miles Household Products Group division following the merger of Miles and Cutter Laboratories.

Miles shifted Cutter advertising to TLK. Spending for the product more than doubled, to $681,500.

Ad spending for other household products fluctuated. While S.O.S soap pads went from $1.3 million to $3.85 million, S.O.Ezy soap pads fell from $1.8 to $332,800.

In the Biotechnology Group, sales of enzyme products increased largely due to increased demand for enzymes used in the production of ethanol for premium no-lead gasoline, and a new enzyme plant in Elkhart was completed for the production of high-volume industrial enzymes.

Miles Pharmaceuticals expanded its business in 1982 with Food & Drug Administration approval of three new prescription drugs, placing the company among the leaders within the U.S. prescription drug business in the number of new drugs approved.

They were Azlin (azlocillin), a semisynthetic penicillin; Niclocide (niclosamide), for the treatment of tapeworm infestations, and Biltricide (proziquantel). Also approved by the FDA was the first antiparasitic effective against all forms of schistosomiasis (snail fever).

Mobil Corp., the 11th largest national advertiser, increased its ad spending 9.2% in 1982 to $320 million from $293.1 million in 1981.

Worldwide sales for the New York-based company fell 6.5% to $64.14 billion in 1982, while earnings fell 43% to $1.38 billion. Declining earnings were partially offset by a switch to the LIFO (last in, first out) method of accounting for its foreign inventories, which contributed an additional $220 million to earnings in 1982.

Mobil's first-half net earnings in 1983 jumped 23% to $652 million, reflecting lower Mideast crude oil prices and improvements in worldwide refining and marketing operations.

While the energy giant increased its over-all advertising budget in 1982, partly because of intensified advertising efforts of Montgomery Ward & Co., its retailing subsidiary, it cut back 20% in measured media spending to $48.3 million, according to Leading National Advertisers.

The company held spending for general corporate promotion steady at about $5.6 million in 1982. The op-ed page series of advertorials appear in nine daily newspapers and in the Oil Daily, Economist and Time, while the "Observations" series runs mainly in Sunday supplements.

The company also continued to maintain high corporate visibility through extensive underwriting and sponsorship programs.

For instance, early in 1983, the Mobil Showcase aired "The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby." The company spent more than $1 million promoting the special and also contributed $1.4 million to its production costs. Mobil's total spending for its involvement with "Nickleby" was $6 million, and while ratings for the critically acclaimed program exceeded expectations, in terms of cost-per-thousand it was perhaps one of the most expensive advertising buys for a tv production ever.

Also in 1982, the company, along with WGBH-TV in Boston, acquired U.S. tv rights to 47 hours of programing produced in England by Granada Television, including "The Sherlock Holmes Stories," a 13-part series to be telecast in the 1983-84 season.

Another development drew substantial fanfare for Mobil in 1982: The $2.1 million award to Mobil Corp. president William Tavoulareas, in a libel judgment against the Washington Post, which reported he had used his position at Mobil to establish his son in business. That award was overturned later in the year, but the jury's initial ruling against the Post sparked a lively exchange between Mobil ads and editorial writers.

In a change in its organizational structure made late in 1982, Mobil Corp. formed two major operating units. Mobil Oil, which will run traditional oil- and gas-related activities, is headed by president Allen Murray, formerly president of Mobil Oil Corp.'s marketing and refining division. Richard Tucker was named president of Mobil Diversified Businesses. Mr. Tucker had been responsible for chemicals, paperboard packaging and corporate research and engineering.

Earnings from Mobil's petroleum operations totaled $1.72 billion in 1982, or $963 million less than the previous year. (Earnings from energy operations are measured before corporate expenses and other items, hence they are actually more than Mobil Corp.'s total earnings.)

Worldwide net crude oil and liquids holdings increased 3.4% in 1982, and total capital outlays for global exploration and producing reached a record $3.6 billion.

In 1982, the company's technologically advanced Statfjord B platform began production, and its completion strengthens Mobil's already strong presence in the very rich fields of the Norwegian North Sea.

Another platform, Statfjord C, is now under construction, and is expected to be completed by the end of 1985. All three Statfjord platforms—including Stratford A—are expected to reach their peak at the end of the 1980s, and the company anticipates production of 590,000 bbls. daily.

Mobil spent $4.4 million advertising gasoline in 1982, all in spot tv. Mobil motor oils received $3 million in measured media in 1982, down from $3.5 million a year earlier.

The company also expanded its test of a 4-cents-per-gal. discount for cash purchases to include the Southeast, mid-Atlantic, Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia. Unlike competitors, including Exxon, Mobil does not specifically support its two-tiered pricing with advertising.

The company also began testing card-activated automated gas pumps at 22 stations in the Kansas City area. The computer terminals on the pumps are connected by a special telephone network to Mobil credit headquarters, also in Kansas City.

In the diversified businesses division, earnings from worldwide chemical operations were down 78% in 1982 to $20 million. The company attributed the decline to general economic weaknesses in the petrochemical, phosphate rock and plastics industry, as well as development of a petrochemical complex in Saudi Arabia.

Mobil Chemical Corp.'s Hefty plastic tall kitchen bags were supported by $8.1 million in 1982, compared with $3.3 million in 1981. Hefty plastic trash can liners, however, received only $3.4 million in 1982, down 57%. Ad spending for the entire Hefty line was up 8% in 1982, to $13.2 million.

Montgomery Ward, Mobil's troubled retail merchandising company, saw some bluer skies than in previous years. In 1982, it cut its losses to $93 million, compared with a loss of $160 million in 1981 and a loss of $162 million the year before.

Ward has centralized its advertising activities and is targeting younger, more affluent consumers. While measured spending was more than halved in 1982, to $9.2 million, industry sources put total advertising for Ward, which has increased its use of preprinted inserts, at more than $180 million.

Four stores were closed, as well as two catalog distribution centers. Four full-line stores were opened in 1982, bringing total Ward's units to 389.

Jefferson Ward's, a discount subsidiary, now has 51 stores.

Philip Morris Inc., New York, the fifth largest advertiser in the U.S., increased its advertising by 16% to an estimated $501.7 million in 1982 from $432.3 million in 1981.

Consolidated sales of the tobacco, beer and soft drink marketer were up 7.6% to $11.7 billion from $10.9 billion in 1981. Earnings totaled $781.8 million during the year, an 18.5% gain over 1981.

The company's cigaret unit sales were up, increasing its share of the market, while sales volume for its Miller Brewing Co. unit were down.

For the first half of 1983, operating revenues were up 11.3% over the same period in 1982, increasing to $6.5 billion from $5.9 billion. Net earnings increased 13.7% to $406.2 million from $357.1 million during that period.

In 1982, Miller Brewing Co., Milwaukee, after two years of declines, experienced a 37.3% increase in operating income to $158.8 million. Over-all, Miller increased its operating revenue 3.2%, although shipments declined 2.5%.

That Miller experienced decreasing shipments was not surprising. In 1982, the U.S. brewing industry as a whole registered its first nongrowth year in 25 years. Miller's total beer shipments declined to 39.3 million bbls. in 1982 from 40.3 million in 1981, and its market share dropped to 21.9% last year from 22.5% in 1981. The premium Miller High Life brand alone experienced a 10% decline in shipments. The company blamed the decline on the recession, saying that beer drinkers had "traded down" to lower-price products. Industry observers attributed the decline, in part, to increased marketing aggressiveness of industry rivals, primarily Anheuser-Busch.

Nonetheless, Miller's two other major brands did show increases. Lite, the third-largest seller among all brands, continued its dominance of the low-calorie segment, and superpremium Lowenbrau managed to achieve a slight sales increase.

Attempting to turn things around, Miller revamped its "Miller Time" campaign. Instead of picturing people relaxing, participants are now shown dancing, shooting pool or playing cards, with Miller High Life a more integral part of active life styles. The tv commercials also are no longer restricted to sports programing; they are now seen on a variety of prime time programs. Miller also increased spending on outdoor boards and in radio, newspaper and magazine advertising.

According to Leading National Advertisers, spending on High Life increased 29% to $48.4 million from $37.5 million in 1981. LNA charted Lite's increase at 30%, up to $44.5 million from $34.1 million.

Unlike the beer category, Philip Morris' fortunes in tobacco rubbed against the grain. Although U.S. cigaret industry sales were flat, Philip Morris USA, the company's largest operating unit, increased unit sales 2.5% to 204.4 billion. In addition, the company's share of the market moved to 32.8%, up from 31.8% in 1981 and just a hair's breadth behind the market leader, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. Operating revenues were up 15.1% over 1981, while operating income increased 21.6%.

Marlboro, the nation's No. 1 selling cigaret brand, set all-time sales records, according to the company, with sales of 119.6 billion units, or 19.2% of the total U.S. cigaret market. Marlboro Lights continued to grow, accumulating a 5.2% share of the U.S. market.

PM's ad spending on its Marlboro brand increased slightly in 1982. According to Leading National Advertisers, spending on Marlboro filters was up 5% to $13.7 million. Spending on Marlboro filter king 100s was up 3% to $15.6 million.

The company's gains, as reflected by Marlboro's sales, were achieved in a marketplace that was anything but stable. Poor economic conditions, combined with numerous state excise tax increases and a major inventory liquidation by wholesalers trying to reduce the effect of the federal excise tax increase on their inventories, resulted in another impediment to profitability for the industry.

Philip Morris International's operating revenues and operating income were up 4.8% and 12.5%, respectively, with profits at a record level, even though unit sales declined 2.7% to $242.7 billion largely because of excise tax increases in a number of markets.

During the past year, PM has moved to attract the sophisticated and upscale smoker with the introduction of two cigaret brands that feature stylish advertising and fancy packs selling at regular prices.

In February, PM began testing Players, a 100mm smoke. In the second quarter it introduced Players king-size select blend and special menthol. July brought Players 100s regular and menthol. The cigarets come in a black box with the brand name in gold script lettering. The company spent between $50 million to $60 million on the Players introduction. PM executives maintain that Players is twice as successful as its popular Merit brand was at the same point in development, based on market share, awareness and repeat purchases.

The other introduction of a "classy" cigaret came in early 1982, when the company launched Benson & Hedges De Luxe Ultra Lights. Packaged in a silver-and-gold box sporting a crest and lined with embossed foil, the brand pulled a respectable 1% market share.

The Seven-Up Co., PM's soft-drink subsidiary, had an increase of 22.8% in operating revenues in 1982, exceeding $500 million for the first time. But the cost of bringing new products to market led to an operating loss of $1.2 million. Full-year sales increases for 7UP were the largest in 13 years. According to LNA, PM's advertising expenditure for 7UP was down slightly to $19 million from $23 million in 1981. The soft drink was promoted through a "No caffeine" campaign, which led to immediate sales and market share gains and the eventual introduction of caffeine-free colas by Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola.

In addition, PM launched Like cola in test markets in April, 1982. Like is now available in more than 40% of the U.S. market.

Seven-Up's food products division began testing Goodbody Snacks Fruit Crisps, its first food product for general retail distribution. The product is a two-line item of all-natural, freeze-dried, sliced fruit packed in foil packages.

The company prides itself on its social activities, and 1982 marked the 25th year of its arts' sponsorship program. A $3 million grant helped underwrite the landmark U.S. exhibition tour of "The Vatican Collections: The Papacy and Art" in New York, Chicago and San Francisco.

Nabisco Brands, Parsippany, N.J., the nation's ninth largest advertiser, spent an estimated $335.2 million on advertising, a decrease of 1.7% from estimated 1981 expenditures of $340.9 million.

During 1982, Nabisco Brands continued with its plan to divest itself of businesses whose products have limited market share and to focus on its package foods business and proven market leaders.

It was also Nabisco's first full year as a consolidated company, since its merger with Standard Brands in July, 1981. The company has undergone considerable revisions of its organizational map since the merger. Nabisco Brands USA now encompasses U.S. Bakery Products; U.S. Confectionery Products and U.S. Grocery Products. There are two other divisions, Nabisco Brands Ltd. in Canada and International Nabisco Brands. The company's international operations account for 33% of net sales and 31% of operating income.

Nabisco reported worldwide sales of $5.87 billion in 1982, a 9% increase over its net sales of 1981, net income rose 18.2% to $314.7 million, earnings per share were up 14.7% to $4.83. The company reported earnings for the first half of this year of $136.5 million, up 5% from the same period last year, and a decrease in sales of nearly 3% to $2.84 billion.

Consistent with its plans to focus on its package foods business, Nabisco sold in 1982 its J.B. Williams Co. toiletries and pharmaceuticals division (Geritol, Aqua Velva, Sominex), to Beecham Group in Britain for $100 million. It also sold Julius Wile Sons & Co., including Fleischmann Distilling, to Whitbread & Co., London, for $155 million. In addition, it sold a minority interest of All Brands Importers to Whitbread. The company sold its Freezer Queen frozen food operations in 1982. In addition, it sold its Tender Leaf tea brand to Procter & Gamble and leased its Clinton corn wet-milling operations.

Nabisco completed its divestiture program with the sale of its Everlon Fabrics household accessories and Hygiene Industries businesses, which were sold primarily to members of the managements of both those divisions. According to the company, in total, the divested portions accounted for approximately $700 million in revenues annually, but "contributed only minimally to our earnings base."

At the end of 1982, Nabisco acquired Huntley & Palmer Foods of Britain, a leading manufacturer of biscuit products and snack foods with annual sales of more than $600 million. The acquisition should allow the company to move into other worldwide areas of distribution as Huntley & Palmer operates businesses in Canada, France, Germany, Ireland, India and the Far East.

The company also continued to fight the cookie and snack wars waged against it by formidable competitors in these industries. At yearend 1982, Nabisco announced it would be spending more on marketing its U.S. Bakery Products division, which includes all cookies and crackers, and accounts for 26% of the company's net sales and 35% of its operating income.

Said by some analysts to have a 40% share in the prepackaged cookie category, Nabisco faces competition from Keebler, American Brands' Sunshine, snack nemesis Frito-Lays, with its 16-variety line of GrandMa's cookies, and a new player, Procter & Gamble's Duncan-Hines.

When GrandMa's was introduced to test market Kansas City, it was said to have garnered a 20% share. Still in selected markets, it is backed by a reported $70 million promotion budget. The Duncan-Hines line of soft and chewy cookies comes in five flavors.

At the same time, analysts commented that Nabisco could get clobbered right in the Oreos, because taste preferences in test markets were favoring the soft and chewy varieties and the company's cookies are basically dry. Countering its critics and its competitors, in July, Nabisco revealed it had assigned Dancer Fitzgerald Sample a 15-item line of premium-price moist and chewy cookies called Almost Home, with plans for tv, print and sampling to introduce the line in nine states.

The company, which spent $8.2 million in measured spending on cookies, launched other ammunition in the cookie war. In 1982, Nabisco rolled national its Gold Line of premium dessert cookies, debuted Apple Bars and introduced an improved Chips Ahoy! with "more chocolate taste," supported by tv and print via Esty. The brand is the leading packaged chocolate chip cookie in the U.S. In April, 1983, it introduced Oatmeal Fudge with strips of fudge on top and, in March, began a campaign offering a free half-gallon of milk with the joint purchase of Oreos and Nestle Quik chocolate drink mix.

In June, Nabisco introduced Home Hearth bread mixes in white, rye and French varieties. It announced it planned a $15.2 million introduction campaign via J. Walter Thompson, with tv to begin in August, 1983, newspaper coupons this month and direct-mail coupons in October. The company says its plans for 1983 include the completion of a fully automated high-rise warehouse in its Chicago facility—"the world's largest cookie and cracker bakery"—and a larger investment in marketing its bakery products division. Nabisco crackers, on which the company spent more than $17 million in measured media (includes Graham crackers, Triscuits, Ritz, Wheatsworth, etc.), are said to hold a combined 50% share of market. In 1982, Nabisco introduced Nacho 'n Corn thins, Potato 'n Sesame snack thins and a cheese version of its Ritz cracker. It also put into test in Orlando, Fla., and Rochester, N.Y., Chit Chat bite-size sesame snack crackers.

The company's confectionery division accounted for 9% or $528.5 million in net sales and 7% or $47 million in operating income. The division, which spent more than $34 million in measured advertising in 1982, includes, among other products, Life Savers and Curtis candies, Care*Free and Bubble Yum chewing gums.

In June of this year, it moved Pearson Candies and Planters jumbo block advertising to Arnold & Co. from McCann-Erickson. Also in 1982, the company added strawberry and sugar-free grape flavors to its Bubble Yum line of bubble gum.

The company's grocery products division in 1982 contributed $1,473.9 million or 33% of net sales and 27% or $168.3 million in operating income. According to Nabisco, two of its brand leaders in this division, Fleischmann's and Blue Bonnet margarines, hold nearly one-fifth of the $1.6 billion margarine market. The company spent $5.5 million in measured ad spending on Fleischmann's and just under $1 million on Blue Bonnet margarines.

The company launched in 1982, and rolled national in 1983, Fleischmann's Light, a low-fat, reduced-salt content spread. Benton & Bowles handles tv and magazine, while JWT Deltakos USA did the medical promotion. It also completed its nationwide rollout of Planters canister snacks, introduced Butcher Bones dog snacks and a new line of flavored mix-and-eat Cream of Wheat cereals.

In June, Nabisco began testing a new corn chip in its line of bagged snacks. Esty's tv spots in those markets feature former boxer Sugar Ray Leonard and his 9-year-old son.

Early in 1983, the company added Toasted Wheat & Raisins to its cold cereal lineup, which is perhaps best known for Shredded Wheat. In July, it announced plans for "Family in Training," a fitness program sponsored in conjunction with the Amateur Athletic Union and promoted along with and on the boxes of the new cereal, Toasted Wheat & Raisins. A company spokesperson called cereal boxes "some of the best media available." The company plans to spend $14 million promoting the program. In 1982, Nabisco Brands spent more than $100 million on broadcast advertising in the U.S.

Last April, it sponsored the first annual Nabisco Dinah Shore Invitational women's golf tournament and plans to do so again in 1983. Nabisco was also the exclusive sponsor for the 1983 Tournament of Roses parade on two networks, CBS and NBC.

Prior to the sale of the J.B. Williams unit in 1982, there was a great deal of speculation about the future of the Parkson agency, which was operated as part of the division. The house agency, which handles more than $60 million in network tv buying and creative for some of the crackers, was not picked up by Beecham at the time of the sale. In June it was reported that Nabisco will disband Parkson and absorb its operations into Don Ohlmeyer Communications, the year-old joint venture between Nabisco and sports and special-programing producer Don Ohlmeyer. The company became a 50% partner with Ohlmeyer in spring, 1982.

Don Ohlmeyer said plans are for his company to do programing and packaging for Nabisco and "to keep Nabisco on the cutting edge of the new technologies, which have tremendous ramifications for a major consumer company such as Nabisco . . . So, in a very controlled way, it is getting its feet wet with software, examining opportunities in cable, programing and so forth."

Nestle Enterprises, Inc., White Plains, N.Y., a subsidiary of Nestle S.A., Vevey, Switzerland, is the 57th largest U.S. advertiser, having recorded $112.5 million in domestic spending in 1982, up 27.8% from the previous year.

A 1.9% drop in U.S. sales to $2.34 billion was blamed on the recession; on cessation or sale of activities in culinary products, particularly the canned fruit operation of Libby, McNeill and Libby, and on cost of restructuring acquired companies.

Consolidated sales of Nestle S.A. fell slightly to 27.664 billion Swiss francs. The drop reportedly was a result of the weakening of the Swiss franc and of the parent company's varied divestitures.

Nevertheless, the profit before nontrading items and taxes amounted to 2.468 billion Swiss francs, up 17.7% from 1981, and the consolidated net profit rose 13.9% to 1.098 billion Swiss francs. Selective limitation of capital expenditures was among reasons cited for the 1982 profit figures.

North American operations accounted for 19.3% of the total 1982 sales, up from 18.7% in 1981.

Nestle Enterprises serves as holding company for The Nestle Co., whose products include a wide array of coffees, teas and candies; Libby, McNeill & Libby, with canned juices, pumpkin and meat among its specialties; The Stouffer Corp., owner/operator of hotels and restaurants and purveyor of frozen foods; Beech-Nut Nutrition Corp., which features children's foods, and Wine World, marketer of premium wines.

Activities in the marketing of American foods remained brisk in 1982, with television being used primarily to tout the products.

Network tv garnered most of the $18 million in measured spending to advertise "improved" Taster's Choice freeze-dried coffee and its decaffeinated line.

Nestle reformulated its Nescafe instant line, rolling out Nescafe Classic and Nescafe Decaffeinated supported by early $3 million.

Backing for Nestea iced tea took a dramatic rise, from $500,000 in measured spending in 1981 to more than $8 million in 1982 as actor Dan Haggerty added his testimonials in tv ads.

Nestea also launched a campaign to promote new Quik syrup in a squeeze bottle, although less than $500,000 in measured spending was devoted to the project.

Despite the plummeting of U.S. candy sales at Halloween time, Nestle's products continued to do well in the American market.

Chocolate morsels, associated mostly with the baking of chocolate chip cookies, won $13.2 million in ad support, up from $9 million the year before. More than $400,000 also was expended for morsel-related contests.

Nestle's 2.5-oz. $100,000 candy bar, sold in theaters and convenience stores, received $2 million in advertising, all on network radio.

Nestle's hot cocoa mix was renamed Nestle's Rich & Creamy, and the company late in the year began franchising ready-to-serve Nestle Quik chocolate milk. Initial ads for the milk/franchising activities were limited to placement in newspapers.

Frozen food sales have catapulted for the parent company and, in the U.S., Stouffer's contributed to the upswing. "Remarkable progress" has been cited in the sale of Lean Cuisine, package frozen entrees with low caloric content. Introduced in a successful 1981 rollout, Lean Cuisine, with $100 million in development monies behind it, captured the buying spirit of weight-conscious Americans. The company spent more than $7.35 million in 1982 to advertise Lean Cuisine.

Stouffer lowered its ad spending for regular frozen entrees and spent more than $1 million in support of frozen crepes, but decreased slightly its budget for frozen pizza to $3.5 million.

Stouffer's Rusty Scupper restaurants, with only $50,000 in outdoor advertising comprising its measured figures, undertook selective expansion. Stouffer, hotel owner and manager, continues to dispose of unprofitable hotels. With sales of $100 million in 1982, Beech-Nut Nutrition turned a profit. The baby food company, which offers some items aimed at older children, extended U.S. product distribution throughout the year.

Though its records indicate losses in 1982, Wine World is expected to break even in 1983.

Libby, having completed sale of its canned fruit and vegetable operations, spent $735,000 on magazine ads to promote its canned corned beef. Libby's juices were backed by only $12,000 on spot tv.

An emphasis on spending in both marketing and research is expected in the future by the international company, which in 1982 opened a research facility in Singapore and is expected to open another soon in France.

Nestle in 1982 instituted an audit committee, headed by ex-Sen. Edmund Muskie, to monitor marketing practices for sale of infant formula. The action followed controversy surrounding marketing of the product in underdeveloped nations. It also came on the heels of the parent company's issuance of guidelines that discourage unnecessary use of formula, and its recommendations to its allied companies to make it easier for employe/mothers to breast-feed their own babies. U.S. acquisitions last year included purchase of Florida's Crittenden Fruit Co., distributor of citrus fruits.

The Swiss company also increased its participation in Avicon, a Puerto Rico-based company that manufactures pharmaceutical products for American markets.

The U.S. remains the principal market for ALCON, a Nestle S.A.-owned pharmaceutical company, whose sales have tripled since it was acquired in 1977 and whose Texas research center now is in full operation.

AA estimate

Nissan Motor Corp. in U.S.A., Carson, Cal. (a subsidiary of Nissan Motor Co. Ltd., Tokyo), was the 55th largest national advertiser in 1982, with an estimated expenditure of $117.6 million, up about 34% from 1981 spending of $87.9 million.

In the fiscal year ended March 3l, the parent company, Nissan Motor Co. Ltd. reported improved earnings from year-earlier figures, with net income up nearly 11% to $399.7 million on sales of $13.4 billion. This compares with earnings of $360.3 million on a volume of $13.3 billion a year earlier.

The Japanese marketer of Datsun cars and trucks produced a total of 2.6 million units for the year (including 155,555 knock-down sets for overseas assembly), up slightly from year earlier figures. But domestic sales in the Japanese homeland were down 3% to 1,112,387 vehicles, while overseas volume dropped 4.8% to 1,341,810 units, not including an additional 160,775 knock-down sets.

Nissan Motor Corp. in U.S.A., the distributor of Datsun cars and pickup trucks in this country, saw its total U.S. sales dropping from 584,489 cars and trucks in 1981 to 578,489 units—470,246 cars and 107,927 trucks—last year. The best-selling Sentra accounted for 131,789 units.

But Nissan's market share in 1982 edged up slightly and amounted to 20.3% of import registrations in the U.S. and 5.9% of the nation's total market. The company ranks fourth in worldwide production, behind General Motors, Ford and Toyota.

Datsun's 1982-83 model year saw a continuation of the creative umbrella "We Are Driven" developed by agency William Esty Co. The theme serves as a unifying device to emphasize specific consumer benefits for each car line, but with the decision to change the corporate logo from Datsun to Nissan, a gradual process slated for the next several years, the Nissan name has become more prominent in the company's advertising. The changeover is expected to cost Nissan an estimated $150 million to implement in the U.S., a cost encompassed in its current ad spending.

The 1983 Nissan models had the support of the largest single ad budget in the company's history, with the introductory effort accounting for an estimated $25 million for the first and second quarters of the fiscal year. The media mix of tv, radio, newspapers and magazines followed the basic pattern set in 1981, but with greater support in local markets. Network tv exposure was provided by NFL Monday Night Football, the fifth consecutive year Nissan has appeared as a sponsor.

While the full Nissan/Datsun line shared in the support given to the introduction of the 1983 models, the main thrust of the effort was behind the new Impulse models, the Sentra and the company's pickup trucks.

The model year saw the introduction of the Nissan Pulsar NX, an all-new car positioned as a sporty, affordable vehicle, priced at $7,400, with special appeal to the young buyer. Theme for the NX campaign, budgeted at $25 million for the first and second quarters, was "Bet you're gonna want one, betcha." Beginning in November, Pulsar had the benefit of heavy tv and magazine advertising, which dramatized the car's styling, economy and interior room.

On the heels of the NX campaign, in June, Nissan added the NX turbo, a Pulsar with a turbocharged engine and vastly improved power potential that was expected to be on the receiving end of a major ad campaign throughout the summer selling season. The NX turbo, which produces 100 bhp at 5200 rpm compared with 69 bhp at 5200 rpm for the NX engine, priced at $8,349, is expected to create a new marketing niche for high-performance, moderately priced compact cars.

Another major portion of the ad budget was devoted to maintaining the sales momentum behind Nissan's economy Sentra, a fuel-efficient front-wheel-drive car that was one of the auto industry's few sales success stories in 1982. With a base sticker price of $4,949, it was the largest-selling single import in the U.S. during the first three months it was offered. Sentra advertising was set to the theme, "You need this car," with ads and tv spots highlighting the quality and low base price. The Sentra is the second car to be marketed under the Nissan name, following the Stanza which last year was positioned as a roomy, family car with excellent gas mileage.

In the spring of 1983, the Sentra was introduced with a new four-cylinder diesel engine option. The diesel engine boosted the car's EPA mileage rating to 48mpg for city driving and 62mpg on the highway.

Special emphasis was placed on trucks, a category that offered maximum growth potential, unfettered by the voluntary import restrictions the Japanese marketers accepted on their cars. "Born to be driven" was the new theme developed for the Datsun pickup trucks, with magazine ads and tv spots that emphasized the ruggedness and durability of the products.

The truck advertising also had a youth orientation, and after offering 9.9% financing in 1982, a new campaign this spring offered an even lower 8.8% rate, reflecting the stepped-up competition between Nissan and its rival producers in Japan and Detroit.

While the full Nissan/Datsun line shared in the support given to the introduction of the 1983 models, the main thrust of the effort was behind the Sentra, the new Impulse models and the company's pickup trucks. Early this year a new pickup truck was introduced as a mid-1983 replacement for the 1983 Datsun pickup, a vehicle that was to be produced at Nissan's nearly-completed $660 million assembly plant in Smyrna, Tenn., which will have an annual capacity of 156,000 trucks. At that point the pickup truck ad theme also shifted to "One heck of a hunk of a truck."

In mid-April, Nissan opened its $4.7 million design center complex in La Jolla, Cal., a studio the company hopes will turn out prototypes of cars slated for the world market. The U.S. was selected for the facility because of its advancements in the design field, "consistently spearheading the establishment of new international trends," according to Nissan's head of r&d.

North American Philips Corp., New York, the country's 67th largest advertiser, increased its domestic advertising an estimated 8% to $90.6 million in 1982.

North American Philips, an outgrowth of Netherlands-based N.V. Philips, recorded a 4.6% increase in sales to $3.17 billion, but net income dropped 29.3% to $73.6 million from 1981 to 1982.

Last year, the three tv lines in Philip's consumer electronics division—Magnavox, Sylvania and Philco—introduced a rear-screen projection system with a 50-in. diagonal screen, a technology emanating from Philips' research and development operations, now integrated among the brands. Each brand, however, has its own advertising program. Magnavox spent $3 million in 1982 in measured media on its color tvs; Philco, $117,000, and Sylvania, $3.7 million.

Through 1982, Sylvania continued its "Best color picture" campaign, backing it with a fourth-quarter regional promotion tie-in with distributors. Game show, trade and co-op advertising rounded out the mix.

As with other consumer electronics concerns, Philips consumer electronics division suffered a decline in the division's videogame sales in 1982. Moreover, the company had to withdraw its successful K.C. Munchkin videogame from the market following a successful challenge in court by Atari Inc., a division of Warner Communications and maker of Pac-Man.

In its suit, Atari claimed that the K.C. Munchkin videogame infringed on its Pac-Man copyright. In September, the U.S. Supreme Court left standing a lower court ruling that prevents Munchkin, a Dutch creation, from invading the markets in the U.S. established by Pac-Man, a Japanese creation under licenses shared by Atari and Bally Mfg. Co.

In other litigation, North American Philips reached a settlement in a lawsuit it had filed against Mattel Inc. for infringement of television-game patents. Under terms of the agreement, Philips reportedly released Mattel from all claims of infringement and granted Mattel a license for the patents.

The company filed the suit in 1980 claiming Mattel infringed on Magnavox's patent on Odyssey 2 when Mattel introduced its Intellivision. The issue centered on the electronic circuitry that converts electrical impulses to images on the screen.

The company, meanwhile, continued to build its Odyssey franchise by launching a new campaign for 50-plus videogames for its Odyssey 2 videogame player. The thrust of the campaign was to promote the Odyssey 2 alphanumeric keyboard, a unique feature in the videogame market. The theme line for the campaign was, "The keyboard is the key to greater game challenge." In all, the division spent $9.1 million on Odyssey in measured media in 1982.

In the division's videodisc activities, Magnavox introduced model VC 8010 and Sylvania model VP 7200, featuring random access infrared remote control. The laser discs, marketed primarily by Pioneer Electronics Corp. and by the 3M Co., feature concerts, children's programs, R-rated titles and special interactive programing discs that invite audience participation.

Norelco consumer products division had its day in court as well. Philips was named defendant in an antitrust suit filed by Remington Products early last year, following Philips' purchase of the Schick name and shaver business from Schick Inc. It had stopped selling its shaver in 1980 after several years of poor sales.

Philips, through its Norelco rotary shaver, commands about 55% of the electric shave market.

Following the purchase, Philips formed U.S. Appliance Corp., Westport, Conn., to market a line of high-quality, high-performance Schick Flexamatic men's foil cord and rechargeable electric shavers and Lady Schick Lite Touch electric shavers.

Boxer Gerry Cooney and football player Mark Gastineau of the New York Jets became spokesmen for Norelco rotatract razors in 1982. The commercials, with the theme "Tough on your beard. Not on your face," ran on prime time tv, network sports broadcasts and late fringe tv, as well as on cable sports programs, which were the recipients of 239 spots in the last six months of the year.

In addition to the shavers, the company also introduced through the Norelco brand its Chic beauty care collection. The introduction was supported by a $2 million network tv effort by McCaffrey & McCall.

Remington filed another lawsuit, this time against Norelco, objecting to claims made by Philips that its shavers were chosen for use during the flight of the Challenger space shuttle in June following extensive research by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

NASA prohibits suppliers from issuing promotional material or advertising that suggests the endorsement by the agency of a product or service. It was reported that the agency said that it had chosen the Norelco shaver on the basis of its shape and not as a result of any detailed research. Under the settlement reached in July, Philips agreed not to make any claims violating NASA regulations. No payment was made by either company.

Also through McCaffrey & McCall, New York, Norelco introduced the Clean Water Machine and two new clean air machines. The introduction of the Clean Water Machine was said to be supported by a budget three times larger than that spent on the 1980 introduction of the Clean Air Machine. Measured media, however, was only $1 million.

Norelco also allocated its largest six-month advertising budget for a Clean Air Machine campaign. The commercials, which began airing in mid-1982, demonstrate the efficiency of clean air machines, and a 30-second spot focused on just the filter. Some $1.7 million in measured advertising went to support the product.

Philco celebrated the 90th anniversary of its name last year in various promotions, including trade advertising and two limited edition anniversary models. The company also introduced a 30-day money-back guarantee on its color tv line.

Last September, Westinghouse Electric Corp. and North American Philips reached an agreement whereby Philips acquired the Westinghouse lamp business for about $200 million in cash and notes in U.S. and Canadian transactions. Also, Philips Electronics Ltd. of Canada, a unit of the New York-based parent, acquired Westinghouse Canada's lamp business.

Other North American Philips divisions include NAP Lighting Corp., Anchor Brush Co., Baker, Knapp & Tubs, a furniture marketer, Selmer Co., the country's leading supplier of band and orchestral instruments, and Caroline Coach Co., the third largest regular route intercity bus carrier in the U.S.

Noxell Corp., Baltimore, the 93rd largest national advertiser, increased its advertising spending 21% to $49.6 million in 1982.

The company, which markets cosmetics, skincare items and household products, had a 12.3% sales increase from 1981 to $261.9 million. Net income was up 9.7% to $18.5 million, excluding the sale of Noxell's holdings in the Neutrogena Corp.

The company said Cover Girl cosmetics accounted for all the company's domestic growth, while toiletries and household products were marginally below 1981 levels.

Dollar sales in the cosmetics division, which accounted for 53% of the company's net sales, were up 27% as Noxell introduced several new products including MakeupMates applicators and accessories and Shape 'N Blush and Pro-Lining Pencils. MakeupMates was backed by $938,400 in magazine advertising.

Cover Girl Clean Makeup, on which the company increased ad spending 32% to $8.6 million, for the first half of 1983 has a 56.5% share of the category in grocery store dollar sales, according to Towne Oller reports. The line also is sold in drug and mass-merchandise outlets. The company said the brand recorded one of its greatest sales increases since its 1961 introduction.

Cover Girl eye makeup as a group was backed by $1.2 million in advertising. Mascara alone got $9.5 million in ad backing, an 18% increase from the previous year, with $8.8 million of it going to network tv. In the eye makeup category, again in supermarkets only, the company's mascara holds a 22.9% share; eyeliner has 45.9%; shadows 19.9%. Leader in the category with a 33% market share is Cover Girl NailSlicks which got $1.8 million in advertising in 1982, down 51% in ad support.

Cover Girl lipstick, with a 14.4% share in supermarkets, was backed by $4.2 million in advertising.

Tv accounts for 73%, or $35 million of total measured spending, for the company, with models Cheryl Tiegs, Christie Brinkley and Kelly Emberg representing the "Cover Girl look."

The company signed actress Stephanie Powers as the new spokeswoman for the Moisture Wear makeup line, positioned for the woman over 30. Moisture Wear was backed by about $5.2 million in advertising, but sources say the product's share is too small to show up in the traditional market share reports.

In the toiletries area, which contributed 25% to total Noxell sales, business did not grow.

Shipments of Noxzema skin cream declined, the company said, because of competitive activity in the category. The product's current share is 19% in grocery outlets. Ad spending was $4.1 million, off 21% from the previous year.

Noxzema 12-hour acne medicine is backed by a campaign that stresses the combination of Noxzema skin cream and the acne medicine that drew $802,000 in network and spot tv spending. The acne medicine alone got $835,000 in ad support, down from a six-month launch budget of $1 million the previous year.

Noxzema Antiseptic skin cleanser grew in sales more than 20%, said the company, which spent $510,000 in measured advertising to back the cleanser and $860,000 for cleanser pads.

RainTree beauty lotion, a facial moisturizer which currently has a 2% share in supermarkets, was backed by $1.5 million, down 38%. RainTree hand and body lotion, showing a 2.7% share, got $4.9 million in advertising. Following the death of spokesperson Natalie Wood late in 1981 when the company pulled advertising for the brand, Noxell moved the RainTree account to Backer & Spielvogel, New York. A new campaign promotes the "RainTree feeling."

Noxzema Shaving cream grew in dollar sales as a result of a price increase. For this product, the company continued spending in cable tv advertising oriented toward men. In other media, the company spent $1.4 million in advertising.

A new advertising campaign for Lestoil bearing the tag line, "the less you like to clean, the more you'll like Lestoil," did not help the product grow. The company said Lestoil's flat sales were symptomatic of changes in the heavy-duty cleaner market. Backer & Spielvogel created the Lestoil campaign, but in late July the agency and Noxell agreed to part company on that piece of business. The company spent $1.5 million on Lestoil in 1982.

Japan's Real Decision Makers—

Their Daily Newspaper Is The Asahi Shimbun.

You've probably heard or read a lot about the unique decision-making process in Japanese organizations, and maybe you're even a little confused about what really goes on. While a lot of attention has been given to the "how", little has been paid to the "who". Put simply, the Japanese decision-making process starts from the bottom and moves toward the top. At the Section or lowest level, problems are identified, proposals are made and the initiative is taken. Among Section workers, morale is high, energy and enthusiasm are common, and the willingness to work long and hard is taken for granted.

As the facts clearly show, their newspaper of choice is the Asahi Shimbun. Published twice daily in Japan's major commercial and population centers, backed-up by several combined area editions, and having a large nation-wide readership, the Asahi Shimbun is a quality newspaper which reaches the people who count. If your need is to inform or persuade Japan's decision makers, then let the Asahi Shimbun carry your message to the source.

Pan American World Airways, New York, the country's 80th largest advertiser, spent $72 million on advertising in 1982, more than double the $35 million spent in 1981.

Pan Am joined other major air carriers in the financial doghouse in 1982. Sales dropped to $3.71 billion during the year, down 2.1% from the 1981 level. Moreover, the company suffered a loss of $485.3 million in 1982, compared with an $18.9 million loss the previous year.

However, for the second quarter of fiscal 1983 ending in June the airline reported its first quarterly profit in three years when net income hit $10.4 million on revenues of $946.2 million, compared to the same period in 1982 when Pan Am suffered a loss of $56.2 million in net income and revenues of $969.5 million. The return to the black is a product of a recovering economy, a sharp rise in airline traffic and concessions from employes that reduced labor costs, says the company.

During 1982, passenger levels were down to 12.2 million from 13.5 million the previous year, according to Air Transport Assn. Revenue passenger miles—the number of miles traveled by fare-paying passengers—also declined, from 28.9 billion to 27.2 billion over the same period. The drop in passenger miles pushed Pan Am into third place from second among domestic airlines; United Airlines and American Airlines now rank ahead of it.

But during the second quarter of fiscal 1983, passenger services increased 2.5% to $738.8 million and the revenue passenger yield rose 1.9% to 10.39 cents per revenue passenger mile from a year earlier.

Despite its poor bottom-line performance in 1982, Pan Am's major ad budget increase made it the nation's leading spender on airline advertising during the year. The company's 1981 ad budget placed it sixth in total ad spending among U.S. carriers.

The increased budget centered on a campaign that broke last April with the over-all theme, "Pam Am, you can't beat the experience."

The campaign was designed to accomplish a number of things for the ailing airline, including beef up its international operations, shed a reputation for poor service and highlight the standardization of the individual classes in and the upgrading of its fleet.

The ad campaign, created by Wells, Rich, Greene, the airline's third agency in eight months, came seven months after C. Edward Acker, Pan Am chief executive officer, stepped in to pilot the company.

Immediately after taking office he left his mark by starting a program to improve business by adding new routes and slashing fares. Late last year a $99 fare was instituted between New York and 17 cities, including seven in Florida, and on transcontinental flights during limited periods.

The move was quickly matched by Eastern, TWA, United and American (which does not provide service between New York and Florida).

The day after Pan Am announced its $99 air fare, the company said that bookings for its flights topped 59,000, breaking a one-day record for the airline. The program apparently was successful enough to warrant an extension in selected markets during the early months of 1983.

This past April, the airline once again began a discount program when it announced plans to cut some fares on its domestic routes to about half those proposed in a new distance-based fare structure initiated by American Airlines.

At approximately the same time, Pan Am also launched a new campaign that touted low fares across the Atlantic. The campaign, which the company said is a substantial chunk of its $35 million ad budget for 1983, broke in newspapers, magazines, radio, tv and outdoor boards in 37 markets. This was the first time the company made extensive use of outdoor advertising. The print effort broke in New York and rolled out through the rest of the markets Pan Am serves.

The print campaign featured a luggage-toting Uncle Sam and the headline, "America's going to Europe this summer on Pan Am." It emphasized that the carrier flies to London from 38 U.S. cities and that its fares to London are $220 lower than last year.

In another move to beef up international travel, Pan Am in January hired the Sydney, Australia, office of Hill, Holliday, Connors, Cosmopulos to handle the public relations effort for its nonstop Sydney-to-Los Angeles flight, at 7,500 miles the world's longest nonstop flight. Preliminary efforts were to be aimed at the Sydney press in an effort to develop awareness of the flight. Pan Am's Australian pr account had been handled inhouse.

That Pan Am is emphasizing the promotion of international travel and offering discounts to European cities makes sense, considering that 75% of the airline's revenue comes from international flights. Its foreign competitors are largely government-owned carriers with relatively easy access to new funds.

In addition to the fare cuts instituted by Mr. Acker, the airline got its employes' unions to agree to a 10% wage cut and a 15-month freeze. The agreement reached with the Flight Engineers International Assn. and the Air Line Pilots Assn. alone is expected to save Pan Am an estimated $98 million in 1983. In all, the company won concessions from all five of its unions.

In addition, Mr. Acker has let it be known that he intends to cut flight miles by 8% and expenses by 4%, while keeping fares unchanged, on the average. As a personal concession, Mr. Acker agreed to not accept any of his $350,000 salary for 1983 until the carrier returns to profitability.

Following the bankruptcy of Braniff International last year, Pan Am began negotiating with the airline to rent its Latin American markets. Braniff's intention was to spin off its moneymaking service to Pan Am while maintaining the right to resume Latin American service sometime in the future.

The proposal, styled as a joint venture by the two airlines, would have added all but Braniff's Venezuela service to Pam Am's route system, an expansion Pan Am estimated would add $200 million a year in new revenues to its balance sheet.

Under the agreement, Pan Am would pay Braniff "at least" $30 million in the next two years for the right to fly the Braniff route system, with the possibility of paying the carrier even more if business and profits were good. The plan, however, would have bent normal international aviation rules. The Civil Aeronautics Board is responsible for selecting which U.S. carriers get international routes, and Air Florida was first in line asking for a crack at some of Braniff's South American markets, with a number of other carriers close behind. Eastern Airlines was eventually awarded the routes.

In February, Pan Am and Norwegian-American Cruises announced a joint marketing program offering frequent air and sea travelers an extensive mileage bonus. The promotion is an outgrowth of the carrier's World-Pass program. A direct-mail packet announcing the program was sent to more than 800,000 prospects. Wunderman, Ricotta & Kline, New York, and Epsilon, Burlington, Mass., handled the program.

J.C. Penney Co., New York, the nation's third largest retailer, spent $230 million on advertising in 1982, becoming the 26th largest U.S. advertiser.

Sales in 1982 were $11.41 billion, an increase of 0.3% over 1981, considerably less than the 8% compounded rate Penney's has averaged the past 10 years. Net income from continuing operations increased to a record $430 million in 1982, a 9.4% increase from 1981, despite high unemployment and the devaluation of the Mexican peso that helped produce at Penney's border stores an income-per-share decline of 35 cents.

Income from continuing operations was 3.8% of sales in 1982, the highest in the last 10 years.

Penney's total ad and promotion spending of $230 million, a 10.3% increase over 1981, included $54.7 million in measured media. Retail advertising for individual stores is not included in the measured figures, although expenditures for preprint newspaper advertising are included in AA's estimate of unmeasured spending. Catalog preparation and distribution costs also were omitted.

Clothing categories paced Penney's media ad budget by line item. Topping the list was Penney's family sportswear, $10.6 million; women's apparel, $5.8 million; men's sportswear, $4.2 million; women's intimate apparel, $1.7 million; men's suits and sportswear, $1.4 million; men's sport shirts, $1.2 million; men's apparel, $1.2 million, and women's sportswear, $1.1 million. Instore services included auto insurance, $2.4 million, and Penney's home entertainment center, $2.3 million. Miscellaneous accounted for $8.5 million. Thrift Drug Stores spent $1.7 million in measured advertising.

In 1982, Penney's decided to discontinue the sales of home appliances as well as its own product service organization. Instead, the company will utilize RCA and General Electric Co. to sell microwave ovens, floorcare equipment and patio furniture.

The company also will discontinue operating automotive centers before the end of 1983. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., Akron, O., will take over approximately 300 Penney's freestanding tire and auto service stores and provide service on existing warranties. The auto centers that are within Penney's stores will be used for other merchandise. These divestitures are part of a program to concentrate on clothing, home furnishings and leisure merchandise. In keeping with that program, Halston, the noted fashion designer, entered into a six-year licensing agreement with Penney's in 1982 that is expected to produce more than $1 billion in sales during that time, and upgrade the retailer's image.

Included in the agreement are plans for popularly-priced women's apparel to be introduced in the fall of 1983, followed by later introductions of men's and children's clothes plus home furnishings in 1984 and 1985. The women's wear will appear concurrently in Penney's stores across the country with the fall/winter catalog.

Introductory efforts will be boosted by what Donald Seibert, chairman-chief executive officer described as a "multi-million-dollar ad campaign," to be created and executed by Penney's agency, McCaffrey & McCall.

Penney's also is revamping its merchandising mix to about 70% soft goods vs. 30% hard goods, compared with the previous ratio of 60/40. Over $1 billion will be spent during the next five years to retrofit existing stores.

Penney's is emphasizing quality in its apparel by featuring more natural fibers and several new private labels.

Levi Strauss & Co., San Francisco, entered into an agreement with both Penney's and Sears, Roebuck & Co. in 1982 to distribute its diversified apparel line.

Catalog sales, about 15% of total sales, rose to $1.7 billion in 1982, a slight increase from 1981. Profits increased slightly despite the opening of the company's sixth catalog distribution center in Manchester, Conn.

Penney's European retail operation in Belgium, where it is that country's second-largest retailer operating under the name of Sarma, contributed $565 million in sales. Elsewhere in Belgium, Penney's closed five restaurants which it operated under the Wendy's system and trademarks because of poor operating results. Options to operate Wendy's units in France, the Netherlands and Luxembourg were not exercised.

Drugstores, operating under the name Thrift Drug or Treasury Drug Center, brought sales of $485 million.

In an effort to encourage consumers to shop for drugs and health & beauty aids at drug chains rather than supermarkets, Penney's hired Marx Inc. of Milwaukee to create a "Little Shavers Savers Club" promotion for Thrift Drug/Treasury Drug. The promotion will allow customers with children discounts on baby needs.

Sales for J.C. Penney Financial Corp., J.C. Penney Financial Services and JCP Realty totaled $812 million in 1982. J.C. Penney Financial Corp. finances a portion of J.C. Penney's customer receivables; JCP Realty is engaged in the development and operation of shopping centers through participation in joint ventures and J.C. Penney Financial Services consists of the operations of the company's insurance subsidiaries. These subsidiaries market life and health insurance and automobile and homeowners casualty insurance.

J.C. Penney Financial Services' net income declined $7 million in 1982 to $22 million from $29 million in 1981. The decline was due primarily to higher underwriting losses.

In 1982, Penney's sold Great American Reserve Insurance Co., a subsidiary that marketed life and health insurance through an agency sales force to Time Inc. for $76 million. Penney's retains both its operations for marketing life, health, auto and homeowner's insurance through direct response and sales centers located in its stores. These operations are conducted through J.C. Penney Life Insurance Co. and J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Co.

Late in 1982, Penney's entered into an agreement with First Nationwide Savings to offer as a test an array of financial products and services in five northern California stores and to credit-card customers through mail marketing. Products available in those stores will include the newly authorized money-market accounts, checking, retirement accounts, mortgages and other loans. If the services prove popular, Penney's says it would expand the concept to other stores, perhaps in 1984.

The $10 million J.C. Penney Financial Services account went from Wells, Rich, Greene to N W Ayer last year.

PepsiCo Inc., Purchase, N.Y., the nation's 13th largest advertiser, increased ad expenditures by 17% in 1982 to an estimated $305 million.

Worldwide, the company spent an estimated $410 million in advertising in 1982, up 8% from 1981.

The company's revenues were $7.5 billion in 1982, a 7% increase over the previous year, but earnings declined to $224.3 million, a decrease of 25%. The company attributed the drop to an unusual charge incurred in the fourth quarter when it closed a company-owned bottling plant in Duesseldorf, West Germany. In addition, the company said, the massive devaluation of the Mexican peso adversely affected the performance of its foreign beverage and food products operations.

PepsiCo has not had a turnaround so far in 1983. For the second quarter of its new fiscal year, PepsiCo earnings dropped 18% to $74.8 million from $91.7 million a year ago, while sales improved slightly to $1.84 billion from $1.81 billion. The poor showing was attributed by the company to a decline in overseas operations that more than offset gains in its major domestic businesses.

PepsiCo's overseas operations particularly came under scrutiny in late 1982 when the company discovered falsified accounts at two of its foreign soft-drink bottling plants that resulted in operating profits of the two subsidiaries to be overstated by $85 million over a four-year period, beginning with 1978. In that time, PepsiCo reported earnings in excess of $1.1 billion. Plant managers in the Philippines and Mexico, who the company said were responsible for overstated assets and understated expenses, were dismissed. The company reported that the two wholly owned foreign operations accounted for less than 5% of its operating profits in 1981.

Back in the U.S., PepsiCo was in the forefront of what many industry insiders referred to as the "Great Soft Drink War," introducing Pepsi Free and Sugar Free Pepsi Free with an estimated $20 million tv campaign ($33 million in 1983). The company also stepped up tv ad spending on Diet Pepsi to battle market leader Coca-Cola.

The company reported that in 1983 Diet Pepsi's budget for tv will exceed $20 million and that the company will spend some $10 million in couponing and sampling for its decaffeinated brands.

The new Pepsi campaign, "Pepsi now," the company said, is a marriage of its local/regional "Pepsi Challenge" and its national "Pepsi's got your taste for life" campaigns, New ads for Pepsi Light feature New York Giants football players warbling "We love Pepsi Light."

One of the more interesting developments in the soft drink war took place between 7UP and Pepsi. Seven-Up Co., promoting its flagship brand as never having caffeine—"and never will," either—lodged a complaint against Pepsi Free for advertising a caffeine-free claim when, Seven-Up said, Pepsi Free is 99% caffeine free.

Pepsi-Cola officials accused Seven-Up, which filed the complaint before the National Advertising Division (NAD) of the Council of Better Business Bureaus, of making a mountain out of a molehill; it accused Seven-Up of misusing the NAD. The result was a reprimand on Pepsi Free.

In terms of market share, regular Pepsi, at an 18.3% share, continued to trail market king Coke, which had 24.4%, according to Beverage Industry. In the caffeine-free category, Pepsi Free had a 4.7% share of market late last year. The category itself averages 6.5% of the soft-drink market, according to A.C. Nielsen Co.

Elsewhere in the PepsiCo family, the food products division, which consists of Frito-Lay and PepsiCo Foods International, saw its sales increase 7% to $2.35 billion in 1982. Earnings also rose, reaching $326.4 million, up 9%.

PepsiCo claimed that Frito-Lay is the leader in the $20 billion snack food industry, with Lay's potato chips recording a 16% rise in sales in 1982. Sales of Ruffles potato chips were up 21%; Doritos brand tortilla chips, up 11%; Tostitos tortilla chips, up 7%, and Fritos corn chips, up 8%.

During the year, Frito-Lay introduced TaTos, an extra-crispy potato chip, in a few test markets. Although the company declined to give sales results, it said the brand performed well and has expanded to additional markets in the Midwest.

Frito-Lay also entered the $2.5 billion retail sales packaged cookie market with the introduction of GrandMa's brand cookies in three test markets. Frito-Lay said sales in test markets earned the GrandMa brand the No. 2 spot in those areas. The company expects to complete introduction of the snack by the end of 1984.

Of note in the Frito-Lay division in 1982 was the death Dec. 6 of Herman W. Lay, co-founder of the company. When Frito-Lay merged with Pepsi-Cola in 1965, he became chairman of PepsiCo. In 1971, he became chairman of PepsiCo executive committee, and he retired in 1980.

In PepsiCo's food service division, which comprises Pizza Hut, Taco Bell and PepsiCo Food Service International, sales reached $1.26 billion in 1982, as earnings totaled $119.3 million. In 1982, Pizza Hut had an estimated ad budget of $50 million, representing a 60% increase in ad spending and a switch to stronger emphasis on local marketing. A new campaign continued the "Home Town Pizza Hut" theme.

Pizza Hut also launched a massive store remodeling program and introduced some new products. Company officials said the $200 million remodeling program for the 4,000-unit chain is designed "not to change Pizza Hut's image but bring it into the 1980s." Plans call for the opening of some 100 new stores in 1982 and double that amount in 1983.

Product expansion included the introduction of Pan Pizza throughout the system. Also, the chain implemented a lunch program in 440 restaurants with a 6-in. personal pan pizza served in five minutes.

Taco Bell, a 1,600-store chain in 46 states, is considered the undisputed leader in the Mexican fast-food segment, with an estimated market share of nearly 50%.

In 1982, Taco Bell selected Tracy-Locke/BBDO, Dallas, to handle its nearly $20 million account, replacing Grey Advertising, Los Angeles. The agency also handles PepsiCo's Frito-Lay account.

Like Pizza Hut, Taco Bell also underwent an expansion and facelift, including a drive-through service that the company claims can increase the sales of a single restaurant up to 15%. In addition, Taco Bell introduced Taco Bell Grande—a "two-handed sandwich"—in July.

PepsiCo Food Service International, responsible for foreign restaurant operations and for food and equipment supply systems at Pizza Hut and Taco Bell in the U.S., oversaw the opening of nearly 50 company-owned restaurants abroad.

PepsiCo's transportation division, consisting of North American Van Lines, a nationwide household goods mover, and Lee Way Motor Freight, an interregional carrier, saw revenues drop 5% to $688.1 million and earnings fall 53% to $15.2 million in 1982 from 1981 levels. The company blamed the declines on weak levels of U.S. industrial production and marginal price increases in the trucking in-

In PepsiCo's sporting goods division, Wilson Sporting Goods had sales of $318.5 million in 1982, an increase of 37% over 1981. Earnings were up 15%, reaching $19.2 million.

Wilson claimed that it has a corner on more than 50% of the golf equipment market. Additionally, it said that it has maintained its current market share in racket sports and improved market share in team sports equipment.

One of its main product introductions in 1982 was the colored Optic Orange golf ball, which, commercials for the ball say, speeds up the game because it is easier to see and locate. Other introductions included a metalwoods series of golf clubs and Tiara clubs, for women.

In the rackets product area, Wilson introduced Sting and Ultra graphite rackets, which it claims are growing in popularity among tennis players.

Pfizer Inc., the nation's 85th largest advertiser, increased its domestic ad spending 11% to an estimated $65.7 million.

Worldwide sales for the company increased 6% to $3.5 billion from $3.3 billion in 1981. Net income rose 22% in 1982, from $273.7 million to $332.8 million. U.S. sales in 1982 reached $1.6 billion, a 14% increase over the previous year. As a percentage of total sales, the U.S. portion was 47%, up from 43% in 1981.

In the first quarter of this year the company's sales increased to $910 million, up 11% from the first quarter in 1982. Net income rose 25% in the quarter, from $89 million to $111 million. Pfizer operates five business segments: Healthcare, consumer products, agriculture, specialty chemicals and materials science. In 1982, only healthcare posted a sales gain of 16%. In this year's first quarter that segment again led the field, with a sales increase of 24%.

Sales in the consumer products division declined 3% last year. The drop was attributed to the conversion of Japan's Coty operation to a distributorship; the segment would have posted a 2% sales gain without that loss in sales. In the first three months of this year consumer products posted an 8% sales decline.

Leeming/Pacquin and Coty comprise the bulk of Pfizer's consumer products business. The former markets proprietary drugs, including Ben-Gay ointment and Unisom sleep aid. Both had particularly strong performances last year.

Ben-Gay's advertising budget increased by 88%, from $3.4 million to $6.4 million. Leeming/Pacquin is hoping to expand the brand's use by promoting it for application both before and after exercise. Tennis star Ivan Lendl appears in Ben-Gay tv spots in his first commercial endorsement.

In a major ad budget leap, Pacquin body cream received $1 million in spending, compared to $40 thousand in 1981. In both years all money went to magazines.

Coty's largest product category, women's fragrances, declined 15%, suffering from the downturn experienced by the entire fragrance industry.

The company increased ad spending for Stetson, a line of men's fragrances introduced late in 1981, from $3.9 million to $4.6 million.

Ad spending for Sophia perfume dropped 12%, from $6.1 million to $5.4 million. Last year Coty extended the line to include the Sophia Body Spa Collection.

Coty also introduced a new "24" Luminescent Lipstick, a long-lasting pearlized lip color. Coty lipsticks had a 216% ad budget increase, from $253,000 to $800,000.

In healthcare Pfizer pursued an aggressive path with new-product introductions in 1982. Procardia, a cardiovascular agent for angina treatment that was introduced early in 1982, had sales of $81 million in its first year on the market. The FDA warned Pfizer late in the year on its comparative ad claims involving the new drug.

Feldene, a once-daily antiarthritic drug, also launched in the U.S. in 1982, achieved domestic sales of $150 million for the year and reached $314 million worldwide. Minipress, an antihypertensive agent, had a 17% sales increase last year, and this year Pfizer plans to file an application for Cardovar, another drug in this field. In December, 1982, Pfizer introduced Cefobid here. The injectable cephalosporin antibiotic reached $15 million in U.S. sales by the end of this year's first quarter.

Backing these new products is a variety of trade and consumer advertising. A series of ads in newspapers in eight cities deals with high blood pressure and angina. The company is planning to release those ads nationally. In November, the company cosponsored a live four-hour "Informathon" with the American Heart Assn., on the Cable Health Network. And the American Diabetes Assn. joined with Pfizer to present posters in physicians' offices asking "Can You Recognize This Diabetic?" The posters feature deceased notables who had the disease.

In January of this year, Pfizer acquired Valleylab Inc., a manufacturer of electronic medical devices, in a stock swap.

Fiscal year ended May 31

Pillsbury Co., the nation's 36th largest advertiser in 1982, increased ad spending to $170.4 million, 30.1% more than the previous year.

The company reported fiscal 1983 net earnings of $138.9 million, up 2% from fiscal 1982's $136.3 million, on sales of $3.7 billion, up 9% from $3.4 billion in fiscal 1982.

Pillsbury made headlines at year's end and again this spring with two comparative ad campaigns for Burger King, the company's most heavily advertised unit. Directed against McDonald's Corp. and Wendy's International, the first campaign drew legal action from both competitors. McDonald's objected to Burger King's claim of hamburgers that are "20% larger" than McDonald's; Wendy's was most concerned about what it said were comparisons between the Whopper and Wendy's single sandwich and about claims that its hamburgers are fried.

The three chains settled out of court, apparently after Burger King agreed to phase out the campaign by year end. But in March, when the Miami-based chain fired another "broiling vs. frying" salvo against McDonald's with a new campaign, McDonald's remained silent. The campaign, part of Pillsbury's over-all attempt to improve the chain's returns, had obvious positive effects on BK sales; the company reported per unit growth of 10% for fiscal 1983, in contrast to the 3% growth it experienced in 1982. Burger King finished calendar 1982 with an estimated 6.5% of the domestic fast-food market.

Burger King subsequently returned to its "Aren't you hungry" theme, using new executions.

For calendar 1982, Burger King's measured media spending totaled $65 million, more than 39% above its 1981 level. The so-called Battle of the Burgers campaign last fall and this spring is said to have cost $20 million.

In April, Burger King announced an agreement with Great Britain's Imperial Group, parent of Howard Johnson's, which will give Burger King U.S. turnpike locations. Howard Johnson's will become the sole franchisee of Burger King in turnpike service plazas in all toll road states.

Burger King attracted additional attention this spring when it signed a joint trade covenant with Operation PUSH to increase business and employment opportunities for blacks and minorities. Pillsbury termed the pact, representing the company's first concerted effort to increase business from blacks, an integral part of the company's attempt to increase its market share.

During the year, the company sold its ailing regional Poppin Fresh Pies restaurant unit to Vicorp Restaurants, a Denver-based chain of pancake houses, for an undisclosed amount, explaining that it prefers national restaurant concepts. While ad support of Poppin Fresh restaurants logically dropped about 31%, to about $1.05 million, support for Steak & Ale jumped 58.7%, to about $5.6 million, and Bennigan's advertising budget nearly tripled, to $1.27 million.

The latest management changes in the restaurant group followed the resignation in June, 1983, of its president, Norman Brinker, who became chairman-chief executive officer of Chili's Inc., Dallas. In the wake of his departure, J. Jeffrey Campbell, who had been named to the new post of president of Burger King's worldwide operations a month before, was named Burger King chairman-chief executive officer, and Hal Smith, former president-chief operating officer of S&A Restaurant Corp., was named its chairman-chief executive officer. Michael Jenkins, formerly exec vp at Steak & Ale, succeeded Mr. Smith.

Pillsbury said it is considering taking an "equity position" in Chili's.

The company moved toward increasing its retail presence in other arenas, too, by purchasing Haagen-Dazs, marketer of superpremium ice cream in the retail market and in franchised stores. Retail sales, manufacturing and distribution operations will be added to Pillsbury's consumer group, while Haagen-Dazs Franchising Co. will become part of the restaurant group.

The company plans to open 150 new franchise stores over the next few years, but also intends to supplement those units with company-owned stores. Haagen-Dazs founder Reuben Mattus will be chairman of Haagen-Dazs under Pillsbury, while his daughter, Doris Mattus Hurley, continues as president and general manager of Haagen-Dazs Franchising Co. and her husband Kevin Hurley will be president and general manager of Haagen-Dazs retail operations.

Pillsbury confirmed its stated intentions of acquiring new units for the consumer food group with its acquisition of the B&B canned mushroom line from Clorox Co.

Pillsbury lost a $62 a share bid for Stokely-Van Camp this summer as Quaker Oats moved into the bidding at $77. Pillsbury is expected to continue its search for new acquisitions.

Pillsbury completed a national rollout of Totino's brand pizza during fiscal 1982 by entering northeastern markets. Still holding the No. 1 spot with about 30% of the estimated $1 billion retail frozen pizza market, the company reformulated its Totino's Classic pizza into a heavier, premium pizza, under the name, My Classic pizza, in an attempt to ward off growing foodservice pizza sales.

Measured advertising for the Totino's line, which dipped nearly 40% to $1.5 million in calendar 1982, is expected to increase during the next year, after new spots for My Classic pizza, featuring Rose Totino, break this fall.

The company also moved the five-item line of Totino's brand Heat & Eat microwave pizza into Minneapolis supermarkets in June, 1982, and later expanded it into other selected markets.

The Haagen-Dazs acquisition put into perspective Pillsbury's August, 1982, test market entry of Spooner's Soft Serve, a soft-serve mellorine dessert, in Erie, Pa., and Fort Wayne, Ind. The product, now being evaluated following its removal from test markets, was supported with tv and couponing.

Pillsbury pledged heavy advertising support for last fall's national introduction of two new items: All-Ready pie crusts and Pipin' Hot Loaf. One Pillsbury executive said the company planned to raise fiscal 1983 ad spending for the refrigerated group to $70 million from $55 million in fiscal 1982. Measured media for refrigerated products in calendar 1982, however, amounted to $21.4 million.

All-Ready pie crusts, rolled out after three years of testing, pushed Pillsbury into the $101 million frozen pie shell category. During calendar 1982, Pillsbury spent $4.2 million in measured media for All-Ready pie crusts.

Pipin' Hot Loaf, refrigerated white-bread dough, debuted nationally around the same time. The product's success led the company to move two more flavors—rye and wheat—into test markets around the end of last year; wheat is being readied for national introduction during fiscal 1984. Advertising for Pipin' Hot Loaf is themed "There's a new loaf comin.'" Using the same yeast-character dough technology, the company early this year entered undisclosed markets with Pipin' Hot Loaf cinnamon rolls, apple danish and soft bread sticks.

This fall, Pillsbury plans to introduce new fudge brownie refrigerated dough as an extension to its leading refrigerated dough line. The company is predicting annual sales of $20 million to $30 million.

Pillsbury renewed its effort to increase its share of the frozen vegetables and frozen entrees markets by backing its Green Giant line with heavier ad support. Measured spending for Green Giant vegetables increased 10.7% to $5.2 million, while the budget for frozen entrees rose 38% to $1.8 million.

In a major move intended to help the Green Giant frozen entree line compete against Stouffer's Lean Cuisine, Pillsbury late this summer entered 12 Green Giant frozen entrees with packages flagged for calorie counts. The repositioned entrees will be backed by couponing and point of purchase ads. Pillsbury holds about 5% of the $1.2 billion frozen entree market, compared with double that share for Lean Cuisine. The company also introduced new boil-in-bag entrees and a six-item line of frozen vegetables packed in liquid. The Fiesta Grande line of frozen Mexican entrees was pulled from the market in late 1982.

The company supported its Green Giant canned vegetables line by product category. Over-all, measured advertising dropped about 10% for the line, to $878,800. In addition, canned mushrooms received $530,000 and the Le Soeur line received $389,000.

In March, Pillsbury introduced nationally a three-item line of Fudge Jumbles dessert mixes, which creates a three-layer snack bar confection with a chewy oatmeal base. The company maintained its estimated 21% share of the cake mix category. Most of the $2.5 million spent for advertising Pillsbury Plus cake mixes and Frosting Supreme ready-to-spread frostings supported the new coconut pecan and coconut almond Frosting Supreme items and the German chocolate and new Oats 'n Brown Sugar cake mixes that they accompany.

Pillsbury made its first significant push into cable tv advertising over the past year, using superstation WTBS-TV and the USA Cable Network for dessert mixes, refrigerated dough and frozen vegetables, and the Weather Channel primarily for sweet rolls and Hungry Jack biscuits.

In a series of management changes this spring, Ray Kimrey, previously group vp-general manager for refrigerated products, was named senior vp-business development and Thomas Reddy, previously director of business development, was named to the new post of business unit manager for toaster products. Thomas McBurney was named group vp-frozen and refrigerated products, succeeding Mr. Kimrey in refrigerated products and Kent Larson in frozen products. Mr. Larson became group vp-dry grocery businesses succeeding Mr. McBurney. During the year, Robert L. Lindsay Jr. was named vp-marketing for refrigerated foods, but retained his earlier responsibilities as director of marketing for refrigerated foods.

Internationally, Pillsbury introduced Totino's Crisp Crust pizza in England as Crispa Pizza last October. Pillsbury GMBH, the German subsidiary, this June acquired Hofmann Menu, a frozen food marketer.

Mired in a nearly saturated instant-photography market, Polaroid Corp., Cambridge, Mass., the 95th largest advertiser in the nation, cut its advertising expenditures last year to an estimated $47.7 million, 7.7% below the $51.8 million spent in 1981.

Company officials also blame the continuing worldwide recession for Polaroid's ills, which included a 9% drop in worldwide sales, down to $1.29 billion in 1982 from $1.42 billion in 1981. Likewise, earnings plunged for the second straight year, falling 24% to $23.5 million, although this pales when compared to the 64% earnings loss the company suffered in 1981.

Although Polaroid continued its domination of the instant-camera field with almost 75% of the market, total sales of instant cameras continued plummeting to only 3.5 million units, down from 4 million in 1981 and a far cry from the instant-camera peak of 9.4 million in the halcyon days of 1979. One half of Polaroid's instant-camera sales last year were for the 600 Series, which were in their first year of distribution.

Sales of instant film for both amateur and technical instant cameras fell for the third straight year below 200 million units, although not as sharply as did camera sales. Polaroid maintained its 25% share of the instant film market.

Polaroid's chairman, William J. McCune Jr., acknowledged the company's overdependence on the amateur instant-camera market when he took office in 1980, and ever since then he's said his aim is to diversify into more technical and industrial fields, which currently account for about 30% of Polaroid's worldwide sales. Yet 1982 marked the first year that the company was seen to have stepped boldly into technical areas. Not coincidentally, 1982 also marked the year Polaroid founder Edwin H. Land severed his last official ties with the company, retiring as both chairman and as a director. Mr. Land was well known to have opposed efforts to bring instant-camera technology into the industrial market.

Indeed, the headline-making product Polaroid introduced last year was not yet another camera, but rather the Autoprocess 35mm System, a three-minute slide processor aimed primarily at technical and industrial users. The unit contains a "processor pack" of chemicals and a 35mm slide mounter. Polaroid also introduced three types of 35mm films to accompany the unit, which fit conventional 35mm cameras and can be developed into color and black-and-white slides. But unlike other previous Polaroid products, the Autoprocess System can use any film and not just the company's own.

The system has been priced under $100, and so is within the reach of amateur photographers as well. But because slide-takers now make up only 15% of all snapshooters, Polaroid is depending upon the commercial marketplace for the bulk of the buyers. Marketing of the system began this past April in Boston, St. Louis and San Francisco, deemed centers of applied photography, commerce and industry. It will be introduced in Europe this fall and throughout the U.S. by the end of the year.

Some observers, however, have their doubts about the competitiveness of the Autoprocess System, especially in its crucial battle against industry leader Kodak's Kodachrome color-slide film. They say the Polaroid color product looks too "grainy" when developed, that it is too costly, and that all the pictures in a standard roll of film must be developed at the same time. But Polaroid argues that the system's chief virtue is, indeed, its immediacy, and the real question remains whether potential customers will, at least for now, be willing to sacrifice some quality for speed.

On the amateur photography front, Polaroid unveiled the SLR 680, a folding, single-lens reflex camera featuring a built-in electronic flash linked to the camera's sonar auto-focus system, which automatically tilts to direct precise flash illumination. The 680 is the top of the line of Polaroid's 600 Series, which includes cameras using high speed 600 ASA instant color film. Initial sales were said to have exceeded company expectations.

Two new low-price 600 Series cameras were also introduced early this year. The Sun 600 LMS (Light Management System) features a built-in electronic flash and is priced at $39.95, while the One Step 600 uses a ten-shot flash array and an electronic "light anticipation network" and sells for a suggested $24.95.

To advertise the SLR 680, Polaroid backed it with the largest promotional budget in its history. Ads were targeted for affluent customers and advanced photo enthusiasts, with copy stressing the camera's state-of-the-art technology and describing the 680 as the most advanced instant camera for serious photographers.

Spending for the autofocus/sun camera and film in measured media was $18 million, most on network tv. The company spent an additional $4.6 million on ads for cameras, $6.8 million for cameras and film combined, and $5.7 million on film only. Almost 85% of all measured advertising from Polaroid went to network tv.

In addition, the company used three other nationwide campaigns to promote the 600 series of cameras and film, including the return of the popular team of spokespeople, James Garner and Mariette Hartley, in an ad called the "$10 Smile-Back."

Polaroid also teamed up with Delta Airlines to boost sales of the 600 Series. The "Buy a Polaroid 600, Fly Delta Free" promotion offered camera purchasers a free round-trip ticket to anywhere Delta flies when buying a ticket of equal or greater value. Supported with national advertising in more than 80 newspapers as well as on network tv, Polaroid's goal was to reach 90% of all households 15 times. The multi-million-dollar campaign, representing 35% of Polaroid's fall advertising expenditures, was estimated to have created more than $1 million in sales, resulting in the company's biggest Christmas sell-through in more than 10 years.

Polaroid's marketing team was faced with its second big blow in a year when Peter Wensberg, executive vp-director of industrial and technical photography and newly named worldwide marketing group vp, moved to Atari Inc. Only months before, Ted Voss, then worldwide marketing group vp, also left to join Atari. Mr. Wensberg's loss was seen by some analysts as the final, most damaging defection, and as a further sign that the company is still struggling to find a focus. Meanwhile, Joseph J. McLaughlin, group vp, worldwide marketing operations, is heading Polaroid's marketing personnel.

In a move that brings Polaroid's move into the technical marketplace more into focus, the company bought 23% of Image Resource Corp., a small California-based company that is trying to develop cameras that take pictures of videotube displays. This may mark a move toward the production of cameras that create high-quality full-color prints or transparencies of graphic information on computer screens. Polaroid already sells film that makes instant 8-by-10 in. color prints for such applications.

Less than 10% of the 50,000 graphics terminals sold in 1981 were equipped with film recorders, in large part because of the current $6,000 to $8,000 dollar price tag on such a system. But Polaroid officials believe that once prices can be pushed below $1,000, sales to offices will explode.

In another move away from instant cameras, Polaroid will soon begin marketing high-performance videocassettes in selected overseas markets including the U.K., Australia and some parts of Latin America and the Middle East. Called Polaroid Supercolor Videocassettes, they will be available in both VHS and Beta versions and will be introduced into the U.S. market next year.

The company is also working on a patent for a disc camera similar to Kodak's. It takes slides that can be viewed through a small screen in the camera and should be less costly to use than traditional instant cameras. The small camera will finally move Polaroid into the conventional camera field, so long shunned by Mr. Land.

Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, the perennial No. 1 national advertiser, is estimated to have increased its 1982 advertising and promotion budget in the U.S. by approximately 8% from 1981, to $726.1 million.

P&G continued its aggressive new-product pace, spearheaded by John Smale, named chief executive officer in January, 1981. By mid-1983, the company had approximately 25 products in test market.

In fiscal 1983, ended June 30, P&G reported sales of $12.45 billion, an increase of 4.3% from fiscal 1982. Earnings increased 11.5% to $866 million.

Although the company appears more than willing to invest in advertising, it has begun to express increasing concern over costs by seeking alternatives to network tv sponsorship and stepping up its own tv show production efforts.

P&G spent a hefty $390 million on network tv in 1982 (down only slightly from the previous year), but rising rates led top management this fall to seek ways P&G and the three broadcast networks could work together to hold the line on costs.

Earlier in the year, the company announced that for the first time it would bypass the networks to air original, sponsored tv movies by producing four original two-hour, made-for-tv movies strictly for syndication purposes. In mid-1983, it made what one broadcast executive called the "largest single sponsorship buy in tv syndication history," by buying a $15 million participation package in seven barter-syndication shows from Lexington Broadcast Services.

The company also sought an exemption to the "no national ads" policy for Operation Prime Time dramatic specials.

The company did produce several network movies, and through P&G productions still produces six regular soap operas. It also produces prime time shows and specials.

Although cable tv spending figures are unavailable, P&G has been increasing its commitment to that medium. It was an early supporter of Turner Broadcasting System's Cable News Network, and is a sponsor of Continental Broadcasting Network's weekly cooking program, "At Home with Beverly Nye," and the series, "Together—Shirley & Pat Boone." On cable superstation WTBS it sponsors "The Catlins," a soap opera, and on Cable Health Network, "Mommy, Daddy and Me." It also makes buys on MTV and BET.

Reversing a trend of recent years, the company increased its spending on spot tv to $179 million, or a boost of 39% from 1981. Although some of that increase can be attributed to extensive test-market activity, observers point to its increased use of syndicated fare on independent stations as it hedges its bets with the networks.

In the sales promotion area, as probably the largest user of sampling, couponing, price-off, on-pack and other vehicles, P&G is estimated to have spent $116.7 million in such unmeasured media. In September, 1982, P&G acquired the unadvertised Tender Leaf tea brand from Nabisco Brands, with sales in the $10 million-to-$15 million range. Observers believe P&G bought the brand as a vehicle to market its new flavor technology, said to capture a "true" flavor.

The Tender Leaf acquisition was one more step to establishing P&G strongly in the beverage area. In the coffee business since 1963, P&G has delved further into beverages in recent years with the acquisition of the non-Canadian soft drink business of Crush International and Ben Hill Griffin Inc.'s citrus-processing business. In late 1982, P&G acquired Coca-Cola Bottling Mideast, a Lexington, Ky., Coke bottler. Coca-Cola Co. sued to block the acquisition, claiming it would result in "misappropriation by a direct competitor of trade secret and confidential business information," but the suit was settled out of court.

Less than a year after acquiring Ben Hill Griffin, P&G was in test market with an orange juice line (frozen concentrate and chilled, ready-to-drink). Called Citrus Hill, it was introduced in most of Iowa and Indiana in late 1982, and moved into parts of New England in mid-1983.

The company, as expected, reentered the feminine hygiene business after exiting the market in September, 1980, when its Rely tampons were linked with toxic shock syndrome.

The new Always feminine napkin line was introduced into Minneapolis/St. Paul and parts of North and South Dakota in March of 1983. Always is a 10-item line of maxipads, minipads and pantiliners.

In food products, P&G began to test what many are heralding as its next "blockbuster" product: Duncan Hines ready-to-serve chocolate chip cookies. The five-flavor line moved into Kansas City test in early 1983, generating so much consumer enthusiasm that the company is having problems supplying the market.

In 1982, the company spent $130 million in measured media on 15 laundry products, up almost 13% from a year earlier. During that period, the company's total dollar share of the U.S. detergent category declined slightly to 51%.

The company spent about $56 million on seven bar soaps; $50 million on five dishwashing products; $75 million on its paper products; $140 million on personal care products (a slight decrease); $67 million on food products; $28 million on household cleaning products, and $46 million on beverages (also down slightly), including coffee and soft drinks.

Several brands received more than $20 million in measured media ad support. Crisco shortening and oil were backed with $22 million (up 5%); Duncan Hines dessert mixes with $20.5 million (down 11%); Folger's coffee with $27 million (up slightly); Crest dentifrice with $39 million (down 14% following the aggressive "toothpaste wars" of the previous year); five Ivory products with $27 million (up 13%), and Luvs disposable diapers with $20 million (up 13%).

Missing from that list in 1982 was High Point coffee, whose spending was reduced 71% to $12.25 million.

Those brands receiving between $15 million and $20 million in measured media support: Cheer and Tide detergents, Pampers disposable diapers, Cascade automatic dishwashing detergent and Sure antiperspirant.

Backed by $10 million to $15 million: Joy and Dawn dishwashing liquids, Scope mouthwash, Secret antiperspirant, Head & Shoulders shampoo, Era and Bold 3 laundry detergents, Coast and Safeguard bar soaps, Charmin toilet tissue and Jif peanut butter.

In recent years P&G has become increasingly active in the paper business as the category has matured and private label and generic products have proved they have staying power.

The company continues to market Summit paper towels and toilet tissue, an unadvertised line priced 25% to 30% below its top-selling Bounty towels and Charmin toilet tissue. It expanded distribution of moderately-priced Banner, a toilet tissue, from test markets in parts of Georgia and North and South Carolina to Atlanta, Charlotte, N.C., Dallas, Houston, Jacksonville, New Orleans and parts of St. Louis and Kansas City. Merit, a similarly priced paper towel, has been testing in Washington, D.C., Maryland and parts of Virginia, Delaware and Pennsylvania since July 1982.

Following several rounds of price cutting, P&G's premium-price Charmin was up more than a point in dollar market share, to 19.6%. Ad spending climbed 30% to $10.5 million. White Cloud, a two-ply product, declined slightly to a 7.6% share, as spending was cut 13% to $8 million.

Ad spending on Puffs and Posh Puffs facial tissues, in 70% and 65% of the country, respectively, totaled $5.5 million in 1982, about even with the 1981 level. An improved "softer than ever" Puffs was moved into 43% of the country. Still testing in Omaha/Lincoln and Des Moines is Certain, a premoistened toilet tissue.

Pampers, one of P&G's strongest brands, slipped in dollar share by nearly seven points to 41.5%. Evidently in an attempt to reverse this trend—believed to be partly the result of consumer preference for elastic-leg diapers—the company in early 1982 tested Pampers with elastic in the legs and quickly expanded the version nationally. Spending on Pampers was steady at about $20 million. Luvs, P&G's premium-price, elastic-legged disposable diaper, was backed by $20.2 million in advertising, up 14% from a year earlier. The brand's dollar share grew to 24% from 20%. The company is testing an improved version of Luvs in the Detroit area.

Among adult incontinence products, P&G has been marketing Attends briefs institutionally for several years, and recently made the brand available in medical-supply stores and via direct mail. In early 1983 it began to test in Louisville an improved version said to provide a more comfortable fit and better containment. It also is testing an Attends pad in Cleveland, Des Moines and Waterloo, designed to fit inside underwear and provide skin dryness for light and medium incontinence sufferers. Both test products are available only institutionally.

Although P&G's laundry detergent brands comprise more than 50% of the market, some of its older, more established brands are slipping. Tide had a dollar share of about 21% in 1982, down from 24% in 1981. Other brands off slightly were: Cheer (7.8%), Oxydol (3.1%), Dash (2.6%) and Ivory Snow (1.4%).

Meanwhile, the newer Solo, a combination liquid detergent and fabric softener, achieved a 3.4% share by the end of 1982. Backed by $8.6 million in advertising, Solo competes directly against Texize's Yes, which has a 2.3% share.

In late 1982, P&G rolled out nationally with Era Plus, a new formulation of the heavy-duty liquid detergent with enzymes. That brand had a 4.8% share at the end of 1982.

A product that P&G reportedly regards as a long-term winner is Ariel, a concentrated low-sudsing granular detergent. It is testing in Colorado, Wyoming and parts of Nebraska, South Dakota, Utah and New Mexico. Ariel is the company's largest-selling detergent worldwide.

The company continued to test Vibrant dry bleach in Charleston, W. Va. In regular fabric softeners, P&G rolled out nationally with an unscented Bounce, and it put a superconcentrated formula of Downy liquid fabric softener into test. Ad spending on Bounce was up more than 30%, to $17 million, and climbed 19% on Downy, to $16.7 million.

In dishwashing liquids, the company lost a little ground, most likely to Lever Bros.' relatively new Sunlight, which achieved a 6.2% dollar share in its first year on the market.

Ivory's dollar share dropped two points to 19%; and Dawn's was down one point to 16.3%. Joy's share was up slightly to 14%. Cascade automatic dishwashing detergent continued to lead that segment.

In mid-1982, P&G moved Cinch, a dishwashing liquid containing abrasives, out of test to Arizona and later to the Northwest.

In household products, the company began to test Spic & Span Pine liquid for use in bathroom cleaning. Testing continues on Brigade, an automatic toilet bowl cleaner, in Kansas City.

Although P&G pulled Rejoice liquid soap from its Texas test markets, it has not given up on the category. It expanded economy-priced Ivory soap brand into portions of Colorado, Utah and Arizona and began to test Lava liquid soap in parts of Georgia.

In regular bar soaps, the company's total dollar market share of 38% was off about two percentage points from the previous year. P&G's brands include Ivory (10.8%), Zest (10%), Coast (6.5%), Safeguard (5.2%), Camay (4.4%) and Lava (1%.)

Spending on Zest was steady at $9.9 million; up 60% on Camay to $9 million; even on Lava at $2 million; up 28% on Coast to $11.3 million; up 26% on Safeguard to $10.16 million, and down 17% to $11 million on Ivory.

Monchel, positioned as a premium-price beauty bar, began testing in September, 1982.

The company, which has been testing Ivory shampoo in Missouri, Maine, Vermont and Wisconsin, entered a different version plus a companion conditioner into test in western Michigan. Although it withdrew Abound and Pert hair conditioners from test, it continues to test Head & Shoulders conditioner in the Northwest.

The company also launched nationally an enriched-formula Prell shampoo. Spending on that brand dropped about 10%, to $8.8 million. Spending on Head & Shoulders dropped 17% to $14.7 million. Pert spending dropped 43% to $8.27 million as it underwent an agency change. Ad spending declined 21% to $4.22 million on Wondra skin-conditioning lotion.

The "toothpaste wars," which grabbed so much attention in 1981, calmed down in 1982 as the gels introduced by P&G and Colgate-Palmolive settled into national distribution. By the end of 1982, Crest toothpaste had a 24.5% dollar share, and the gel had 9.5%, down from the 36.4% share the brand had before the gel was fully launched. P&G's Gleem was about level at 2.4%. Spending on Crest was $39.18 million, down 14% from its all-time high of $45.46 million a year earlier. Spending on Gleem dropped 25% to $8.58 million.

Although it still has about 20% of the antiperspirant market with Sure and Secret, those brands have been declining in recent years.

In late 1982 P&G began testing Oasis antiperspirant/deodorant. The product consists of a white core of antiperspirant ingredients to protect against wetness, and a green gel outerring with deodorant ingredients to guard against odor.

In food products, the company rolled national its Duncan Hines ready-to-spread frostings. It continued to test Duncan Hines microwave cake mix in the Seattle area, and started testing three new varieties of Duncan Hines muffin mixes. Spending on the DH line was $21 million, down about 11% from the previous year.

In the roasted-coffee market, P&G's Folger's maintained its 23.5% dollar market share. In the instant coffee business, Folger's share was up to 11.2% from 9.8%. With a 5.2% share, High Point decaffeinated lost almost one point.

Although it maintains it is in a "learning" mode with soft drinks, the company repackaged Crush and is testing a reformulated version with a fuller, more orange-like taste, in Arizona. Hires root beer also has been reformulated and repackaged.

The company made no major changes in the over-the-counter healthcare brands it got when it acquired Norwich-Eaton Pharmaceuticals in early 1982 and inherited established brands like Pepto-Bismol and the recently introduced Head & Chest cold remedy. The latter entry received about $10 million in introductory support, which began under the previous owner, Morton-Norwich.

A big headache for the company in 1982 came from well publicized rumors linking P&G with satanism. Spreading primarily through the "Bible Belt," the rumors alleged that a P&G executive appeared on a nationally syndicated tv show and revealed the company's link with devil worship. Furthermore, the stories held that the stars in the company's longtime logo/trademark could be connected into a "666" configuration, a number believed by some to be associated with the devil.

After two years of fighting such rumors locally, P&G went public with the problem and launched an aggressive national publicity campaign to combat it. The company enlisted the help of major religious leaders to discredit the rumors and filed suit against several individuals, charging them with "libeling the character" of the company by circulating "false and malicious" statements.

The company appears to be tightening up on its client-conflict policy. In November, 1982, it ended its 10-year relationship with Doyle Dane Bernbach, citing "competitive conflict considerations," and in June, 1983, it pulled all domestic and some international business from Young & Rubicam for the same reason.

The company perceives a "conflict" as anything, anywhere that might compete with any brands in a P&G division for which the agency is doing work.

Included in the DDB split were Coast, Puritan and Gain, which went to Tatham-Laird & Kudner; Grey Advertising and Wells, Rich, Greene, respectively. At the same time, Puffs was moved to Cunningham & Walsh from Grey. Later in the fall, Pert was shifted to Leo Burnett USA from Compton Advertising.

Included in the Y&R split were Ariel, Brigade, Spic & Span and Dash, which went to TLK; Dancer Fitzgerald Sample; WRG, and Benton & Bowles, respectively. At the same time, White Cloud was moved to Burnett from DFS.

Quaker Oats Co., Chicago, which spent its second straight year divesting itself of less profitable nonfood operations, is the 59th largest national advertiser with ad expenditures of $106 million in 1982, an increase of 11% from 1981.

Financial results for its past two fiscal years reflect the company's movement back to its strong suit, the traditional grocery business. Net income in just-concluded fiscal 1983 was $56.8 million, affected by a loss of $62.5 million from the sale of its chemicals and U.S. games businesses. Net income from fiscal 1982 of $96.9 million was the product of a $20.4 million loss on the sale of the Magic Pan restaurant business.

Sales in fiscal 1983 were $2.6 billion compared to $2.58 million a year earlier.

Quaker experimented with its media mix during 1982, dropping magazine advertising 15% to $6.8 million, and boosting spending for spot tv by 49% to $21.2 million and spot radio by 24% to $159,900.

Operating earnings for Quaker's U.S. grocery products business, its largest business segment, were $1.26 billion, a 5% increase buttressed by new products and lower ingredient costs. The figure is 48% of the corporate total.

Although the grocery industry has been showing slow growth over-all, the company's new products—especially Chewy Granola Bars and Ken-L Ration Kibbles 'n Bits—helped generate volume gains. New product introductions in both new and existing categories were highlighted by the national rollout of Chewy Granola Bars—which performed deliciously in 1982—and Halfsies (aspartame-sweetened) cereal. Ad spending was $3.6 million for the granola bars, an increase of 125% from 1981. Two new flavors of Chewy Granola Bars—Peanut Butter & Chocolate Chip and Chunky Nut & Raisin—are being rolled out nationally.

The company's strength in the dog food category has slipped somewhat over the past few years. To combat this, Quaker announced that it is substituting dual-texture Kibbles 'n Bits with Kibbles 'n Bits 'n Bits 'n Bits, a product with crunchy chunks and soft strands. Ken-L Ration Burgers are being replaced with Ken-L Ration Burgers 'n Bones. These reformulations are in reaction to the dollar and volume market share declines the brands have experienced as cheaper dry products have gained favor.

According to Selling Areas-Marketing Inc. figures, the dry segment rose 5% to $1.6 billion, in 1982, while the semimoist category dropped 3.5% to $272 million. Recent Lehman Bros. figures show that Quaker's share of the total pet food market dropped from 8.6% in 1981 to 7.5% in 1982.

Quaker's cat food volume increased in fiscal 1983. Puss 'n Boots Moist Meals semimoist cat food added to the gain. In April, a new soft-dry cat food sold in 48-ounce bags was introduced in 25% of the U.S. The product is sold under the Moist Meals brand name. Quaker has also recently announced the introduction of its first product in the cat treat category, Puss 'n Boots Pounce Treats, marketed in four flavors.

Quaker is still No. 1 in hot cereals. Old standby Quaker Oats' brand was supported with $4 million in measured ad spending, up 11% from $3.6 million in 1981. A new flavor of Instant Quaker Oatmeal, Peaches & Cream, is being introduced nationally.

Quaker had some competition in the frozen pancake batter market (an $8.8 million segment) with Kellogg's introduction of Eggo plain and buttermilk frozen pancake batter. Quaker has Aunt Jemima frozen pancake batter, which had ad support of $439,800 in 1982.

Quaker's frozen food sales showed an increase in fiscal 1983 of 5%. Volume increased slightly over last year. The major growth came from frozen waffles, pancake batter and French toast. Quaker's Celeste brand frozen pizza's volume declined somewhat, but industry tonnage decreased more and the brand's market share increased.

Quaker was among the cereal marketers pushing products targeted to children in 1983. Earlier this year it reintroduced Halfsies cereal and began testing ChocoCrunch chocolate flavor version of the Cap'n Crunch brand. Quaker has an 8.9% share of the $3 billion cold cereal market.

In the international grocery division, operating earnings increased 13% to $59.1 million on sales of $877.6 million, a slight increase because of the strong dollar. To strengthen its overseas cereal business, Quaker acquired Scott's Porage Oats, a leading oatmeal company in Scotland. In October, the company acquired Ralston Purina's European pet foods business to attain the No. 2 market share position or 18% of the approximately $1.1 billion market in Europe. (Mars Inc. is still No. 1.)

Fisher-Price toys, feeling the effects of the videogame boom, reported operating earnings of $29.6 million, down 41% from fiscal 1982, as sales dropped 10% to $335.9 million. The business, which is the market leader in infant and preschool toys, entered the building set business in 1983 with Construx, an action-oriented building system. In fact, Fisher-Price introduced 39 new products at the 1983 Toy Fair. There was a $3.3 million decline in operating income for the division in the second quarter of fiscal 1983 because of slow pre-Christmas retail buying in the U.S. and overseas.

Quaker's direct-to-consumer division continued to be a bright spot in fiscal 1983. The division, which consists of Jos. A. Bank Clothiers, Brookstone Co. and Herrschners, had operating earnings of $15.8 million, an increase of 36%, and sales of $128.6 million, up 9%. Jos. A. Bank Clothiers is a retailer and direct-mail marketer of apparel and accessories. Brookstone is a marketer of hard-to-find tools and fine gifts through mail-order catalogs and retail stores. Herrschners is the leading mail-order marketer of needle-crafts in the U.S. and Canada.

The company's big news in 1983 is the acquisition of Stokely-Van Camp, a food processor whose main products are pork and beans and Gatorade soft drink. Quaker purchased the company for a reported $226 million. Corporate fingers are crossed that this deal proves to be a good one for Quaker, although the acquisition hasn't yet set Wall Street on fire. The Stokely products are viewed by some as being of the no-growth variety; other analysts believe Quaker has paid too much for the new addition.

In July of this year, Quaker redirected some business to BBDO in New York from J. Walter Thompson USA, Chicago. The account is Ken-L Ration Tender Chunks dog food. Advertising for the product was $2.2 million in 1982, but Quaker projects that it will grow to a $6 million to $12 million account by 1984.

The major personnel change in 1983 was the departure of Jack Young, formerly president of the foods division. He has been replaced by Hedric E. "Pete" Rhodes, who was president of the Pet Foods division. Mr. Rhodes' replacement is Douglas W. Mills.

RCA Corp., New York, the 38th largest national advertiser, decreased advertising expenditures by 23% in 1982 to $160.1 million.

Worldwide sales in 1982 were up slightly to $8.2 billion, a new company record and a 3% increase from 1981 sales of $8 billion. Earnings were up from $54 million in 1981 to $222.6 million, halting a four-year earnings decline.

In contrast, earnings declined in the first six months of fiscal 1983 from $121 million to $98.5 million due largely to a year-earlier sale of tax benefits and other nonrecurring gains. Sales rose 8% to a record $4.23 billion from $3.91 billion. Excluding the nonrecurring gains in 1982, the first-half profits would have been 32% above the 1982 period.

Earnings declines in the communications and Hertz Corp. transportation-service sectors (despite record revenues in each) were primary factors offsetting improved performances in other sectors for the first six months.

During calendar 1982, RCA spent more than $1 million in measured advertising on seven different products: NBC tv network ($15.4 million); RCA Videodisc System ($9.9 million); Hertz Rent-A-Car System ($9.6 million); color tvs ($5.3 million); RCA music service ($2.1 million); WYNY radio station ($1.2 million), and videodiscs ($1 million).

Electronics contributes the most to the corporation's bottom line, with sales of $4.35 billion in 1982, a slight decrease from $4.41 billion the year before. The company maintained its ranking as first in U.S. unit sales of both color and b&w tvs. It introduced a new 15-in. screen size, as well as a 26-in. screen last year.

In 1982, RCA introduced several new videocassette models, extending the recording time on a VHS system to eight hours among innovations. RCA also debuted three new SelectaVision videodisc players last year. The company is predicting stereo videodiscs are the wave of the future and will account for 50% of total player sales in 1983.

In records, the word was platinum last year for RCA, which collected 22 platinum records—the highest number in its history. It invested a combined $1.3 million in advertising records and tapes. After moving around to three agencies since 1980, RCA Music Service decided to leave its estimated $3 million account inhouse.

Commercial Products and Services' sales in 1982 totaled $1.2 billion, about the same as the year before. However, operations produced a profit of $16.6 million, compared with a $55.7 million loss in 1981. In the commercial communications satellite category, RCA benefited from contracts of more then $100 million to build the first U.S. direct broadcast satellites. In 1983, the Service Co., a division of Commercial Products and Services, will introduce a small personal tv for the healthcare market and a new 25-in. monitor receiver with advanced design features for industrial and educational purposes.

Broadcasting, a major RCA sales contributor, registered sales of $1.8 billion, up from the $1.6 billion in 1981. Profits were up from $48.1 million in 1981 to $107.9 million in 1982.

The year 1982 was marked by the boycott waged by the Rev. Donald Wildmon of the Coalition for Better Television and then the National Football League strike. Yet through it all, NBC posted improved profits and record sales for the 10th consecutive year. Its measured ad expenditure of $15.4 million, virtually all in magazines, accounted for 29% of all RCA measured spending.

Last season, the network introduced highly acclaimed shows, including "Cheers," "St. Elsewhere," "Remington Steele," "Family Ties," "Knight Rider" and "Silver Spoons." The network also grew in popularity among younger viewers, as it climbed to the top in Saturday morning ratings.

The company-owned tv stations posted higher sales for the 11th consecutive year and record profit for the third year. Sales of NBC Radio were up 14% but profits declined. In 1982, NBC started Talknet, a radio show that features nine hours of telephone call-ins every night. In New York, the company's WNBC-AM garnered the most listeners of any music radio station in the nation, while its fm counterpart, WYNY, increased its audience by 18%.

Attuned to the times, NBC is distributing a portion of its schedule via satellite, with the expectation that the full tv network could be on satellite by the mid-1980s. The radio network is expecting a full switchover to satellite by the end of this year.

Increasingly squeezed for cash to reduce its huge debt incurred in 1979 with the $1.35 billion acquisition of C.I.T., a debt compounded by high interest rates, RCA put Hertz Corp. up for sale in January, 1982, but got no takers. Improvements in the car-rental business and in RCA's own fortunes prompted RCA to pull Hertz off the market in August, 1983.

While RCA tried to peddle it, Hertz increased revenues by 8.8% to a record $1.55 billion in 1982. Earnings skyrocketed 85% to $66.4 million. The company spent $10.2 million advertising Hertz and its various offerings (car lease, credit card, express pass, truck rental etc.), according to Leading National Advertisers.

Early last year, Hertz signed an agreement with Penske Corp. to form the Hertz Penske Truck Leasing, a joint venture that maintains approximately 20,000 trucks. Overseas, Hertz expanded its services in Asia/Pacific and added 40 new locations in Europe.

Another subsidiary once considered for sale, C.I.T. Financial Corp., had the best year in its history, despite the rocky economy. By year's end, C.I.T. financial receivables stood at $7.3 billion, while life insurance increased by 59% to $16.7 billion.

A third company that could be sold is Coronet Industries, a subsidiary suffering declining sales in 1982. Sales hit $222.6 million, compared to $277.6 million in 1981, with the company showing a loss of $6.6 million. A year earlier, profits were $9.5 million.

In management, the big news of 1982 was the addition of Robert R. Frederick, president-chief operating officer. Mr. Frederick was previously exec vp-sector executive of General Electric Co.

Ralston Purina Co., St. Louis, the 27th largest national advertiser, increased domestic advertising spending in 1982 to an estimated $220 million, up 14% from 1981.

After record earnings and sales in 1981, the company's sales decreased to $4.8 billion, a 6.8% decrease from 1981. Net earnings in 1982 plunged 60% to $69.1 million from $174.8 million in 1981.

The country's top marketer of pet foods, Ralston Purina's operations comprise four main units: Grocery products, agricultural products, restaurants and diversified businesses. Only the latter two units showed slight sales and profit gains in 1982, with the grocery and agricultural products divisions both suffering a decline in sales.

Fiscal 1982 was a "pivotal year" for the company, says William P. Stiritz, chairman-chief executive officer.

Although earnings declined substantially because of writeoffs related to divestment action on unprofitable businesses, Ralston Purina is now poised and positioned for improved profitability in 1983, says Mr. Stiritz.

The first three months ending Dec. 31, 1982, already show encouraging signs; sales were only slightly higher than the same quarter in 1981, but net earnings for the quarter were almost 34% higher than the same period the year before.

Ralston Purina is now set on strengthening its core businesses and improving the "underperforming units" or selling them; the company has already taken action toward that end. Country Stand fresh mushrooms were sold so that the company could concentrate on the marketing and sales of its Chicken of the Sea tuna brand.

The company dominates in dry pet food sales, and one of the key strategies during the year was to revitalize several of the company's dry dog food brands, especially Purina Dog Chow and Chuck Wagon.

Increased advertising and promotional support were socked into those brands, with Purina Dog Chow getting $10.4 million in measured media in 1982 compared to $5.9 million the year before and Chuck Wagon measured media support increasing to $8.3 million in 1982 compared to a $7 million budget the year before.

"In the dog food area during most of fiscal 1982 we made a concerted effort to strengthen our primary brands and position them for long-term growth," said William Claggett, division vp, director advertising and marketing services.

"An important part of that strategy was to reallocate advertising and promotion spending in order to place more support behind the primary brands," he added. "We also revitalized other products, like Moist 'n Chunky, Mainstay, Butcher's Blend and Hi Pro, that are important from a strategic standpoint," he added.

Measured media support for Butcher's Blend dry dog food increased in 1982 to $6.4 million from a 1981 budget of $243,000. Meow Mix cat food received a 49% boost in promotional support; from $5.7 million in 1981 to $8.5 million in 1982.

To help increase dollar volume for the grocery division, Ralston Purina introduced a new canned tuna product, Chicken of the Sea tuna with 50% less salt.

The areas where the company did fairly well, considering a troubled economy, were in its restaurant division, particularly the Jack in the Box division, which has 764 units, and Continental Restaurants, the division that manages the Carlos Murphy Irish-Mexican Cafe.

Media support for Jack in the Box declined about 10%, from $9.8 million in 1981 to $8.8 million in 1982. There was no advertising spending for the Carlos Murphy's chain of 13 restaurants in 1982.

Mr. Claggett said tv will continue to be the medium (80%) for Ralston Purina's products, but the company will be going into more print and cable in the future. The over-all strategy calls for a continued competitive drive in its pet foods, said Mr. Claggett, who hinted that the company is looking at various new cereals to come out with in 1983.

Revlon Inc., New York, the 56th largest national advertiser, increased its advertising by 6% in 1982 to $112.9 million. The company placed its worldwide ad expenditures at $223.5 million, a 12.4% increase over the $198.9 million spent in 1981.

Sales decreased slightly to $2.35 billion, down less than 1% from 1981's volume of $2.37 billion. Sales in the first quarter of 1983 also dropped fractionally from $557 million in the first quarter of 1982 to $552.9 million.

Revlon reported sales of $1.140 billion and earnings of $53.9 million for the first half of 1983, compared with sales of $1.125 billion and net profit of $67.7 million a year earlier. Revlon noted that its 1983 second quarter results represented significant increases in comparison with its previous three quarters' results.

Revlon also sustained its second consecutive year of decreased earnings which totaled $111.1 million, down about 36% in 1982 from earnings of $174.8 million in 1981. Net earnings in the first quarter fell to $23.7 million from $28 million in 1981's first quarter. The 1982 decline has been attributed to a combination of operating conditions, management actions and external causes that negatively affected the company's worldwide beauty busi-

Did you hear about the sweepstakes where there were 163,000 first prize winners?

Or about the five million instant-win rub-off game cards where even a laser couldn't budge the rub-off ink?

Or about the nationwide contest where the rules were omitted from the ads?

Enough to give an advertiser a permanent tic whenever the word promotion is mentioned!

In the promotions business, when something goes wrong you don't just get egg on your face. You lay an omelette the size of Nebraska. In other words, one mistake and you're dead.

Even worse, it's not only the perpetrator who suffers the heart attack. The client—and the product—can be damaged, sometimes terminally. That's why, when you're planning a promotion, you should go with the best—organizations with proven track records of trouble-free promotions.

A 25-Year Track Record

For over 25 years, we've originated, designed, planned and managed games, contests and sweepstakes for hundreds of clients—many of them major advertisers like the Coca-Cola Company, United Airlines, Exxon, Polaroid, Alcoa and Lorillard.

A pleasing point is that most of our clients have been with us, promotion after promotion, for many years. With originality and innovation, expertise and experience, we've helped turn their marketing problems into golden opportunities.

But more importantly, they know they're in safe hands. They know that when it comes to games of chance, we leave nothing to chance.

In fact, there's only one thing missing from our 25-year track record in the promotions business. An embarrassing mistake.

ness which now accounts for 49% of total sales, compared with 53% in 1981. Sales of Revlon's healthcare group rose by 7% in 1982 to $1.19 billion from $1.11 billion in 1981, accounting for about 51% of total sales, compared with 47% in 1981. Operating profits in 1982 were $160.8 million, up 6% from $152.2 million.

In 1982, the beauty product category registered a $1.16 billion volume for the company, compared with $1.25 billion in 1981. Operating profit dropped to $124.5 million in 1982, down 40% from the previous year's $207.5 million. Operating profit from outside the U.S., Canada and Puerto Rico was $13.8 million, down from $21.8 million in 1981.

The domestic side of the beauty business contributed $791.3 million in sales, or 34% of total corporate sales, down from $820.7 million in 1981. Operating profit declined from $185.8 million in 1981 to $110.7 million in 1982, accounting for an estimated 39% of total operating profit.

In 1982, net sales of cosmetics, fragrances and toiletries outside the U.S., Canada and Puerto Rico were $368.3 million, compared with net sales of $432.3 million in 1981, while operating profit for the year was $13.8 million compared with $21.8 million in 1981. These declines reflect the impact of a strong U.S. dollar against foreign currencies as well as other economic disruptions related to inflation, recession and government price controls in principal markets and continued operating problems in many areas.

In 1982, Revlon's domestic beauty products sales were hurt by ongoing reduced retailer inventory levels and high return rates that produced out-of-stock situations and inventory imbalances in stores. While Revlon was not the only company hurt by these practices, it was disproportionately affected in part because of the diversity of its product lines. According to the company, added pressure on profit margins came from volume shortfalls, promotional programs implemented to counter competitors' intensified pricing and other allowances to the trade and costs associated with Revlon's decision in September, 1982, to significantly boost print and tv advertising and coordinated merchandising programs for key products.

Besides increasing advertising, marketing and merchandising support, Revlon adopted several other strategies to deal with these problems, including a general reduction in the nonsales work force, other administrative and cost-reduction and cost-avoidance actions, while expanding and reorganizing its sales forces. It also initiated programs to phase out the prestige-price Etherea line and the popular-price Charlie cosmetics in the U.S. and to trim other cosmetic lines. Revlon also introduced a number of new products, including Pure Radiance Special Effects powder for face, eyes and lips, Skin Balancing Makeup, Flex Appeal Mascara, Liquid Nail Wrap and Nail Starters.

Charlie, Jontue and Scoundrel fragrances, each with about $4.6 million, $3.8 million and $2.9 million in measured media advertising, were repositioned with new advertising and coordinated merchandising concepts.

In domestic sales of lip makeup, Revlon had a constant 29% share while its total dollar share of mascara fell off slightly from close to 17% to about 15%. Dollar share of eye shadow sales hovered around 20% while liquid makeup share slipped about 1% to 32%.

In haircare, the company maintains that Flex shampoo retains the lead position among cosmetics shampoos while Flex conditioner is the No. 1 after-shampoo conditioner in the U.S. The successful defense of Flex and the repositioning of Aquamarine shampoo in 1982, management says, opened the door for a greater segmented marketing approach to haircare.

Overseas the company introduced Colourtones, a new line of face and eye cosmetics, in Europe and Australia as well as Revlon Sensations Perfumed Body deodorant spray for women in South Africa and Revlon Esteem allover deodorant cologne for men.

In healthcare, the Barnes-Hind/Hydrocurve division introduced a new extended wear soft contact lens to correct astigmatism and GP-II, a new semisoft gas permeable contact lens. Its Soft Mate Weekly Cleaning Solution was the first intensive cleaning solution for the care and maintenance of all soft contact lenses to receive Food & Drug Administration approval. Barnes-Hind/Hydrocurve Group remains the leader in sales of extended wear soft contact lenses with about a 60% share of market, ahead of CooperVision's 40% share. Barnes-Hind/Hydrocurve is the second largest supplier of soft contact lenses, according to the company, and in the total contact lens market outside audits estimate it is ranked third, tied with CooperVision.

In other healthcare developments, the company's Coburn division Choyce Mark VIII and Choyce Mark IX introcular lenses helped Coburn broaden its position in the IOL field while Coburn also introduced C-Lite, a new eyeglass lens that is scratch resistant, tintable and in photochromic form. Among other developments, Norcliff-Thayer's NoSalt, a salt alternative, reached national distribution, and a licensing agreement was reached to market chymopapain, an injectable drug that was recently approved by the FDA as an alternative to surgery for slipped disc treatment everywhere except the U.S., Japan, Canada and the Caribbean.

Research and development expenditures for both healthcare and beauty reached $114.7 million, about 26% more than was allocated in 1981.

R.J. Reynolds Industries, Winston-Salem, N.C., leapfrogged four companies in 1982 to become the nation's fourth largest advertiser, registering $530.3 million in ad spending, up 65.0% from $321.3 million in 1981. The dramatic rise reflects the inclusion of figures from Heublein Inc., which Reynolds, the largest tobacco marketer in the U.S., acquired in 1982.

The $1.39 billion purchase, completed late last year, falls into line with Reynolds' gradual broadening of its financial base and its further movement into an area it knows best—consumer package goods.

With Heublein figures from Aug. 20 to the end of the year included, Reynolds saw sales of $13.08 billion in 1982, up 11.8% from $11.69 billion in 1981. Earnings from operations during the year increased by 6.0% to $1.59 billion from $1.50 billion in 1981. Net earnings during that period jumped to $870 million from $768 million the previous year, a rise of 13.3%.

For the first half of 1983, sales reached $7.45 billion, up 24.4% from $5.99 billion in 1982. Earnings from operations during the period increased to $786 million, up 2.6% from the $766 million reported in 1982.

The addition of Heublein has created a wide-ranging array of products now wearing an RJR corporate label. In all, RJR's operations consists of the following: Tobacco, food and beverages, foodservice, energy, transportation and packaging.

Heublein, based in Farmington, Conn., markets a number of brands familiar in the world of consumer goods, including Smirnoff vodka, Harvey's Bristol Cream, Inglenook and Colony wines, Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurants, A.1. steak sauce and Grey Poupon Dijon mustard. In fiscal 1982, which ended June 30, Heublein had sales of $2.14 billion, up 4.4% from $2.05 billion in fiscal 1981. Net earnings increased 16.6% over the same period, rising to $102.8 million from $88.2 million.

To integrate Heublein into its corporate structure, RJR established the RJR food and beverage group and appointed Hicks B. Waldron, Heublein's chairman, president and chief executive officer, to head it. However, in July, Mr. Waldron, who many speculated was in line to succeed J. Paul Sticht as chairman of RJR, was named president and ceo of Avon Inc.

At presstime, Reynolds had not named a successor to Mr. Waldron. The group he had headed comprises Heublein Spirits & Wine Co.; Del Monte Corp., which RJR acquired in 1979, and Kentucky Fried Chicken Corp.

Tobacco, of course, remains RJR's raison d'etre; in 1982, the leaf provided 50%, or $6.66 billion, of the corporation's total net revenues and 70% of its earnings from operations. Comparable percentage figures for 1981 were 52% and 69%, respectively.

At the end of 1982, R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., the corporation's tobacco marketing arm, continued to be the industry's U.S. leader, holding 33.4% of the market, enough to nose out Philip Morris USA's 33.0%. Though RJR's share increased from the 33.0% it had in 1981, speculation continues that PM will bump the longtime leader from the top spot. In fact, one top analyst, John Maxwell of Lehman Bros. Kuhn Loeb, said such a toppling had already occurred halfway into 1983.

In 1982, RJR Tobacco introduced two line extensions—Vantage Menthol 100s and Vantage Ultra Lights—and one new product, the mint-flavored Bright. These introductions are microcosms of industry developments of recent years, as most of the attention has focused on products designed for low-tar appeal or to attract young women, a demographic group the marketers like. (Mr. Maxwell, however, suggested that the popularity of low-tar cigarets, which skyrocketed during the past decade, may be forming a plateau on the growth curve.)

Among the company's existing brands, Winston continues to head the list, ranking as the No. 2 cigaret in the country, behind PM's Marlboro. In 1982, it held 13.2% of the market, down slightly from 13.3% in 1981.

As it was the company's top brand, Winston was also the recipient of the most measured media support, with $42.5 million in 1982, up from $38.4 million the previous year. Of that amount, $22.1 million went to magazines, $2.8 million to newspaper supplements and $11.6 million to outdoor.

Salem, the nation's top menthol brand and No. 3 over-all, saw its market share increase to 8.8% from 8.7% in 1981. To help achieve that level, the company supported the brand with $30.9 million in measured spending, about the same as in 1981. Of the total, $17.2 million went to magazines, $2.8 million to newspaper supplements and $10.9 million to outdoor.

Much of the excitement RJR experienced in 1982 came from its third brand, Camel, which saw its market share rise from 4.8% to 4.9%. The brand has been making steady increases in recent years after suffering from declines in the previous period. Camel in 1982 received $26.5 million in measured media support, compared with $19.7 million in 1981. About $10.5 million of the amount went to magazines and $16.0 million to outdoor.

In an unexpected move in May, RJR moved the Camel account from BBDO, which had developed the successful "Where a man belongs" campaign, to McCann-Erickson. The move caught BBDO officials by surprise and was said to stem from RJR's pique at "an attitude of aloofness, almost superiority" that one source described BBDO as having.

Vantage, RJR's low-tar entry, also saw its share increase, from 3.7% in 1981 to 3.9% in 1982. The brand received $32.1 million in measured media support, two-thirds of which went to magazines and a third to outdoor. In 1981, Vantage had $29.9 million in measured spending.

RJR's other two brands, besides new product Bright, are More and Now, the former designed to appeal mainly to women and the latter a member of the ultra-low tar segment. In 1982, More received $28.0 million in measured support—the relatively high level is attributable to the introduction of More Lights in 1981—and Now got $14.4 million.

Bright, the late-year new entry, received $9.9 million in measured support as the brand rolled out across the country, accompanied by heavy advertising, sampling and couponing.

Meanwhile, RJR has attempted to adjust to changing market conditions brought on primarily by heavier tax assessments on cigarets scheduled for early 1983. First, the company late last year embarked on a heavy couponing campaign—$1.50 to $2 off on cartons—to reduce inventories in anticipation of the price rises necessitated by the tax increases. Another approach, one that RJR termed a "minor test," was to keep prices below $1 a pack by putting packs of 12, rather than 20, cigarets in vending machines. The idea is still being tested in Florida.

A third strategy has been the introduction of Century, a pack of 25 cigarets for the price of 20 (and nine packs—225 cigarets—in a carton), which falls in line with the "value-added" concept of marketing. RJR said Century is not designed to compete with fast-growing generic cigarets, but rather the brand will fall in line with the "value-added" concept of marketing.

So far, Century is in 33 states; the quirks of local laws, however, stand in the way of a full national rollout. For example, in some instances, those laws prohibit the sale of cigarets in units other than multiples of 10. Nevertheless, RJR claimed it is selling Century faster than it can make them. And for the moment, of RJR's competitors, only Brown & Williamson Tobacco Co. has entered the 25-unit market in the U.S. B&W's version is called Richland.

In its food and beverage group, Reynolds continued to work on streamlining and strengthening Del Monte Corp., the San Francisco-based marketer of canned goods, frozen fruits, beverages, beverage mixes and fresh fruits.

Among the developments in Del Monte's household during the past year:

- Picking up on the continued consumer interest in health and nutrition, the company introduced an 18-item line of "no salt added" Del Monte canned vegetables.
- Another market "hot spot," Mexican foods, prompted the company to introduce a line of Mexican foods in Los Angeles. In addition, it introduced a new and improved line of Patio frozen Mexican dinners and burritos.
- Hawaiian Punch fruit drinks reached store shelves in aseptic packages, the latest rage in the packaging field.

It is interesting to note that since RJR acquired Del Monte in 1979, which at that time was not known for marketing prowess, advertising for the brand has increased substantially. In 1982, measured media spending totaled $10.3 million, the bulk going to the Lite line of canned foods introduced in 1981. The figure doubled the previous year's level.

Other brands and their measured media support included Hawaiian Punch, $9.8 million; A.1. steak sauce, $8.5 million; Ortega Mexican foods, $6.9 million; Chun King foods, $4.4 million, and Grey Poupon mustard, $2.1 million.

Among the spirits that Heublein, the second largest liquor marketer in the U.S., brought to the fold is Smirnoff vodka, the No. 2 selling brand in the U.S., trailing only Bacardi rum. Yet, although vodka remains a category that gets favorable looks in a declining spirits market, Smirnoff case sales were off slightly, down to 7.2 million from 7.3 million in 1981, according to Mr. Maxwell, the analyst.

Other Heublein brands are Popov vodka (No. 11 in the U.S.) and Black Velvet (No. 20). In 1982, Smirnoff received $8.9 million in measured media support, while Black Velvet got $4.4 million. Support for Popov was minimal.

In the wine market, Heublein is the second largest vintner in the U.S., ranking behind E&J Gallo Winery. In 1982, according to Impact, the wine and spirits newsletter, Heublein had 9.4% of the U.S. market, down from 10.0% in 1981. That compares with Gallo's 26.9% and Coca-Cola Co.'s Wine Spectrum's 6.3%.

Heublein markets its wines under the Inglenook and Colony brand names, with the former on an upswing and the latter, though repositioned, struggling to maintain a competitiveness, according to Impact. In 1982, Heublein supported Inglenook with $7.4 million in measured media spending, while Colony received $2.8 milion.

Heublein's other major entry in the marketplace, Harvey's Bristol Cream sherry—a brand that has received considerable ad awareness through its sassy "Downright upright" campaign—received $3.1 million in ad support in 1982.

One shining star that Heublein brought to RJR is Kentucky Fried Chicken, the nation's third largest fast-food (or, as RJR prefers to put it, "quick service") restaurant and an enterprise that just a few years ago was on the verge of being fried itself. The largest of the chicken restaurants, an active segment in recent years, KFC opened 120 new owned and franchised units in 1982, bringing the total to 4,365. In addition, there are about 1,400 units in 54 countries overseas.

In 1982, KFC reported sales of $2.4 billion. In fiscal 1982, company-owned stores had revenues of $433.0 million, up 10.9% over 1981. That follows an 18.9% increase from 1980 to 1981. Measured media support, most of it in network tv, was considerable in 1982: $42.6 million.

The RJR takeover has prompted fresh optimism that the conglomerate's vast resources will enable the chain to expand even further. The KFC National Co-op, for instance, has voted to increase operators' contributions to advertising from 1½% to 2% of sales, promising even more awareness of the "We do chicken right" or other campaigns.

Other RJR units include Aminoil Inc., a petroleum exploration and production company, and Sea Land Industries Investments, the world's largest containerized shipping company. Revenues were down in both businesses in 1982, although Sea Land recorded a 52% increase in earnings from operations over 1981. In recent weeks, RJR has put the word out that it is considering selling or spinning off Sea-Land.

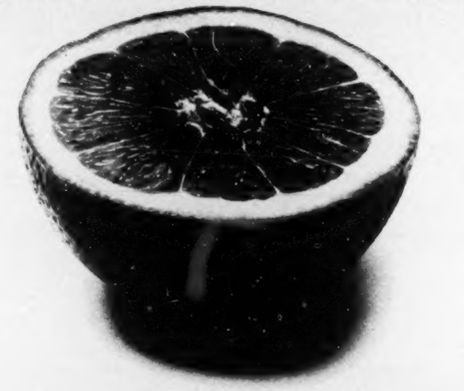
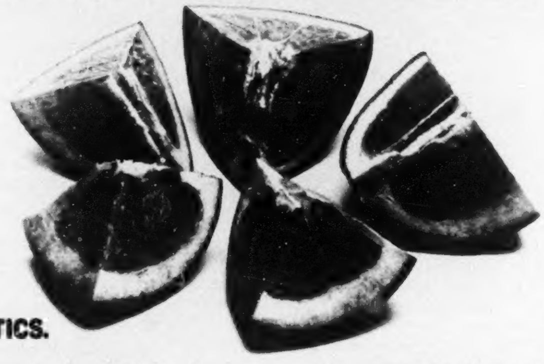
IN MIAMI ONE TV STATION REACHES HALF THE MARKET.



IT TAKES 5 STATIONS TO REACH THE OTHER HALF.



SIMPLE MATHEMATICS.

A lot of media buyers make the mistake of thinking that Spanish television reaches minority households without much buying power.

Well if you make that mistake in the Metro-Miami market, get ready to say adios to a lot of your clients.

Because in the Miami-Metro market, the Spanish audience means big numbers in the ratings race. And even bigger numbers in terms of buying power.

Consider: The South Florida Latin buying power is estimated at $7 billion. Miami's Latin market comprises one half of Metro-Miami's population. The median Latin household income is a whopping $22,000 plus per year. Which buys a lot of Whoppers, Big Macs, Cervezas, soap and so on.

And in this market, the Latin television market audience does its shopping in Spanish, on television, on Channel 23, the TV channel Miami's Latins watch more and believe in more than any other TV channel in South Florida.

Consider: Channel 23 is now the Number One ranked television station in prime access time in the Miami-Metro area.*

Channel 23 is also the Number Two ranked station in the Miami-Metro area during fringe and prime time combined.

And the Number One television station in attracting women aged 25 to 54.

Which means if you're not including Channel 23 in your overall Miami media buy, you're not talking directly to a $7 billion market.

In plain English, you can't make it in Miami without speaking Spanish.

On Channel 23.

Richardson-Vicks, Wilton, Conn., the nation's 50th largest advertiser, decreased its domestic advertising spending by an estimated 13% in 1982 to $129.3 million.

Worldwide sales rose 3% to $1.12 billion from $1.09 billion in 1981. Net income, however, decreased 20%, from $83.2 million in 1981 to $66.9 million last year. The company attributed the decline in income to the strong U.S. dollar abroad.

The company's fiscal 1983, ended June 30, 1983, showed sales of $1.12 billion, practically the same as its 1982 sales, while net income dropped 23.1% to $51.4 million. The decline was attributed to unfavorable currency exchange rates, particularly involving the devalued Mexican peso. Conversion on fiscal 1983 sales amounted to a loss of $180 million when compared with 1982 average exchange rates, R-V stated.

The company attributed the drop in income to high inventory costs in Mexico and marketing support for newly launched and acquired products. At the end of the third quarter, R-V acquired Vidal Sassoon Inc., marketer of haircare products. Sassoon's annual worldwide sales exceed $110 million, with 80% coming from the U.S. The Sassoon acquisition represents R-V's second step into the haircare field. Early this year it acquired Pantene, a marketer of hair and skincare products with worldwide sales of $65 million in 1982. R-V has had a strong presence in the European haircare market, but with Sassoon and Pantene it may have gained a strong foothold in the U.S.

At the start of fiscal 1983, the company purchased Percogesic analgesic from Endo Labs, a subsidiary of E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. Annual sales of the drug have reached the $6 million level. It is another example of R-V acquiring an established brand in a field where it formerly had no entries.

R-V also acquired Mill Creek products, a marketer of natural haircare and skincare products. Mill Creek's goods are sold in health food stores and nutrition centers of mass merchandise stores. Mill Creek, which has annual sales of $12 million, is slated to become a unit of Plus Products, an R-V subsidiary.

While R-V said it will continue to support its key brands, which have traditionally been cold remedy products, these acquisitions represent a move away from dependence on one area. At the end of fiscal 1982, categories other than cold remedies accounted for more than two-thirds of the company's annual sales.

Sales in the consumer products division, which markets the Vicks line, increased only slightly in 1982, rising from $954 million in 1981 to $956 million. As in 1981, a mild winter accounted for the low cold and flu incidences, resulting in lower sales levels for the cold products. In November of last year, the company rolled out an improved Vicks Sinex nasal spray nationally. The product is designed to offer relief for up to 12 hours. Advertising for the brand itself declined by 6% in 1982, from $4.7 million to $4.4 million.

Advertising for Vicks DayCare cold capsules declined even more markedly, as the company dropped network tv advertising for the product. Ad support dropped 84%, from $3.1 million in 1981 to $477,000 last year.

Vicks Headway, a multisymptom product introduced with great fanfare in the fall of 1981, had a 63% drop in ad spending last year, from $4.5 million for its debut to $1.7 million in 1982.

One new product launched last year was Tempo, a chewable antacid. The product, competing in the $500 million antacid market, was supported by $2.6 million in ads in 1982, most of it going to network tv.

In the personal care field, Oil of Olay, the industry leader in the skin-moisturizer market, is facing assaults on several fronts. In June, American Home Products' Whitehall Laboratories introduced Youth Garde moisturizer, with Catherine Deneuve as spokeswoman. Gillette is planning to expand its Aapri line of cleanser/moisturizer.

According to trade sources, Oil of Olay's market share dropped from 34% in 1981 to 31% last year. Ad spending fell 29% last year to $26.1 million from $37 million in 1981.

Denquel, a product the company introduced in fiscal 1982, received $662,000 in ad spending, all in magazines. R-V believes that the product, a toothpaste for sensitive teeth, has a large market, with 40 million adults suffering from tooth hypersensitivity.

At the end of last year, R-V started test marketing Lavoris Formula Z, available in mint and cinnamon flavors. Ads stress an ingredient that the company claims neutralizes the causes of breath odor.

In the home care products division, sales of Formby's wood care and refinishing products increased by 50% last year. Several new products are in development or test, while ad spending rose to $5.5 million in 1982 from $4.4 million in 1981.

Royal Crown Cos., Atlanta, the 92nd largest national advertiser, increased its domestic advertising spending to an estimated $50.3 million in 1982, up from $37.9 million the previous year.

Net sales for Royal Crown Cos. were up 4.2% last year, to $469 million, compared with an increase of 2.8% in 1981. In 1982, earnings were up 2.6%, to $16 million, and the company experienced its 46th consecutive year of uninterrupted dividends.

The earnings gain, despite poor performance by several of the home furnishing subsidiaries, was accomplished through heavy investment in advertising and promotional expenditures in support of the new soft drink products.

Royal Crown Cos. operates in four business segments: Soft drinks, fast foods, citrus juices, and home furnishings. Food and beverages account for more than 85% of total sales. The company sells its products in 60 countries.

Higher revenues by the soft drink and fast food divisions offset lower sales by citrus and home furnishings. Over-all, Royal Crown Cos.' businesses performed well despite the economic conditions that prevailed in 1982.

Royal Crown Cola Co., the soft drink segment, produces and markets principally RC Cola, RC100, Diet Rite and Nehi brands to retail stores through franchised and company-owned bottlers.

The fast food business involves licensed and company-owned Arby's roast beef sandwich restaurants.

RC's citrus operations process and market natural fruit juice products under the Adams and Texsun brands and private labels.

Its home furnishings business involves the maketing of Frederick Cooper lamps, Couroc serving trays, Athens bedroom and occasional furniture, National pictures and frames and Hoyne mirrors.

Rolling Meadows, Ill.-based Royal Crown Cola Co., RC's largest division, had a six percent sales gain to $242.7 million and increased its operating profit 18% to a record $26.8 million. Exceptional unit sales growth of RC100, together with higher prices, generated a 6% increase in total soft drink sales from 1981.

Royal Crown Cola Co. is noted as the innovator in the soft drink industry. It was the first national company to introduce the 16-oz. bottle, the first to sell soft drinks in cans and the first to market a diet soft drink (Diet Rite in 1962). In 1980, it launched the caffeine-free era with RC 100 Sugar Free. As expected, other soft drink companies, spurred by RC's success, recognized the potential of the caffeine-free segment of the market and introduced imitative products during 1982, including PepsiCo's Pepsi Free, Philip Morris' Like, and caffeine free Coke.

The pioneering company's most recent development comes in the form of a sodium-free, caffeine-free version of its Diet Rite brand. The soft drink industry's first such product formulation will contain NutraSweet, G.D. Searle & Co.'s new aspartame sweetener. Currently, Diet Rite contains caffeine and is sweetened with saccharin.

Led by RC100, the original caffeine-free, sugar-free cola, the soft drink division increased its market share to 2.7 in 1982.

To reinforce and capitalize on RC100's leadership position, the company's investment in soft drink advertising and promotion was increased more than 40% over 1981's expenditures. RC100 continued its exceptional sales growth with unit sales increasing more than 75% over the prior year.

However, being first with a new product doesn't guarantee sales leadership in a competitive market. Cola forerunners, Coke and Pepsi, have an advantage in that RC is distributed in only 45% of the country. Because it lacks sufficient financial backing, Royal Crown Cola Co. is unable to support adequate market segmentation.

In April 1982, RC broke with Decaffeinated RC, a sweetened, decaffeinated counterpart to its RC100 brand.

According to the company, the introduction of Decaffeinated RC was the product of 2½ years of research, rather than an attempt to combat the success of Seven-Up's, "Never had it, never will" campaign.

Decaffeinated RC failed to carve a niche within the booming caffeine-free cola segment. In September, 1982, the company repositioned Decaffeinated RC as the "regular" counterpart of its successful sugar and caffeine-free trailblazer, RC100, due to disappointing consumer response to the brand. A new graphic design—a red logo on a silver can—was also included in the over-all marketing face-lift.

Stepped-up competition within the soft drink market forced Royal Crown Cola Co. to re-evaluate marketing strategies for its cola brands. In January 1983, the company announced that it would move its estimated $20 million account to Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York from Ogilvy & Mather, which handled the account for four-and-a-half years.

The biggest sales gainers last year, according to Beverage Industry, were the diet drinks, which accounted for nearly 14% of the entire category, an 11% increase in diet sales from the previous year. Total soft drink volume was up 2.7% from the previous year, to just more than six billion cases (24 8-oz. containers per case), the magazine estimates.

With America's growing interest in physical fitness and staying slim, soft drink analysts predict major growth in the coming years will be in the sugar-free portion of the industry. During 1982, RC's efforts were focused on this area of the business, ultimately increasing its share of the diet soft drink market by .2%.

Early in the year, nationwide taste tests of the National Advertising Division of Better Business Bureau confirmed the authenticity of Diet Rite's April 1981 ad claims against Diet Pepsi and Tab. Royal Crown Cola Co.'s sugar-free products, Diet Rite and RC100, account for 29% of RC's total soft drink sales.

Research done by Beverage Industry cites RC Cola brand as ranking ninth among the top ten soft drinks, per million cases/market share. During 1981 Diet Pepsi managed to move ahead of RC to be ranked eighth.

Distributing problems plagued Royal Crown Co. throughout most of the year. In January, Joyce Beverages of New York—already a Royal Crown Cola distributor—attempted to carry Phillip Morris' Like decaffeinated cola. RC objected, and Joyce sued in federal court, seeking a preliminary injunction that would forbid RC from terminating the bottler's franchise agreement upon distribution of Like. The court ruled against the bottler, saying the selling of Like would prohibit the distributor from giving RC its "best efforts."

In bottling, RC now operates six company-owned plants which produce 22% of its soft drink case sales.

Arby's Inc., Royal Crown Cos.' fast food subsidiary, reached $575 million in systemwide sales, up 8.4% from the 1981 total of $527 million. Arby's revenues increased 19% to $83.6 million, but earnings of $7.5 million were slightly below last year.

Earnings were not only affected by higher restaurant operating costs, but also by consumer demand. According to Larry Krueger, senior vp-marketing, "Arby's has a high reliance on beef and total beef consumption is on a downward trend. We are leaders in a market that's declining.

In January, 1983, Arby's Inc. selected Grey, New York, for its $6 million to $7 million account, formerly with Lois Pitts Gershon, New York.

In October, 1982, Arby's broke with a new campaign, touting the theme, "Arby's, you've said a mouthful," stressing its diverse menu, which includes its new chicken and deli sandwiches. There were 1,218 restaurants in operation at yearend—150 company-owned, 1,068 licensed. Arby's systemwide sales reached $575 million, a 9% gain from the previous year.

Royal Crown Cos.' citrus division sales of $78.0 million were below 1981 results, and operating profit declined 25% to $8.1 million from $10.8 million.

Home furnishings' results were disappointing, strongly affected by the weak economy. The division operated at a loss of $1.9 million in 1982, and sales of $65.5 million were down from the previous year's $70.5 million.

Schering-Plough, Kenilworth, N.J., the 51st largest advertiser, increased its advertising spending by 3.4% in 1982 to $123.9 million, up from $119.8 million in 1981.

Sales of the drugs and cosmetics company rose less than 1%, increasing to $1.82 billion in 1982 from $1.81 billion the previous year. Profits rose slightly, to $183.5 million in 1982, an increase of 2.3% from 1981.

During the past year, the company made some major agency switches and consolidations and ventured into two new market areas with extensions of existing product lines.

The Tylenol poisoning scare last October prompted the company to introduce St. Joseph maximum-strength pain reliever for adults by November. Schering-Plough budgeted $20 million to support the product, launching it with a tv, couponing and sampling campaign.

The company also added a children's nonaspirin to the St. Joseph line. This entry is not surprising considering the market for children's aspirin continues to erode as wary parents search for alternatives. In the past two years, Johnson & Johnson's Tylenol nonaspirin has seen its share rise to 61.8% from 47.2% in 1980; at the same time, St. Joseph's share dropped from 18.1% down to 11.8% in the children's aspirin category.

According to Leading National Advertisers, Schering-Plough spent $1.6 million on measured advertising for the St. Joseph's brand, down 15.3% from 1981. This decrease could be attributed to a mild winter and fewer colds, prompting less advertising for cold tablets and cough syrup.

Sales of Schering-Plough's U.S. cosmetics division increased 11% to $181.7 million, down from a 14% increase from 1980 to 1981. Total measured spending for the division was $25.2 million, up 10% from 1981.

The company expanded its Maybelline product line by entering the fragrance category with Daydreams perfume, cologne and spray. The moderately priced entry ($5 to $9 range) was supported by a $4.2 million tv and magazine introductory campaign themed, "The fragrance for memories that linger." Maybelline also introduced six additional new products, including Eye Writer pencils and Rich 'n Gentle mascara. The company spent $10 million advertising its mascaras, up 18.5% from 1981, and holds a 61.4% share in grocery store dollar sales, according to industry sources.

Shares of grocery sales of other Maybelline products are as follows: Eyeliner, 58.5%; lipstick, 37.1%; eye shadow, 30.4%; facial makeup, 16.1%, and nailcare, 12.3%. The future does not look bright for the company's Moisture Whip makeup, as it has accumulated less than a 1% market share. The company pushed the product line hard in 1981, spending more than $9 million in advertising as it attempted to expand with the introduction of a group of moisturizers. In 1982, ad spending dropped 24% to $6.9 million, with $1.8 million spent on creams and lotions advertising, down 62% from 1981.

Other new products of note that Schering-Plough introduced during the year included Drixoral long-acting decongestant/antihistamine (formerly an ethical drug), Escort tick and flea collar and Dura Soft contact lenses, which made their debut on the West Coast in September, 1982. Sales of the company's vision care division were $14.4 million in 1982, up 55% from 1981.

In the suncare category, Coppertone continued to dominate, despite a cool, wet summer in many regions of the country. Schering-Plough's suncare division spent $11.1 million in measured advertising, a 38.7% increase from 1981's spending level of $8 million. It continued heavy support of two products it introduced in 1981—Coppertone Lite and For Faces Only. Measured spending for Coppertone lotion (Lite included) was $1.6 million, up from $32,300 in 1981. The company spent $1.84 million in measured spending for its For Faces Only products, with $1.74 million of that used to advertise the line's suntan lotion. In 1981, the company spent only $151,000 on the line. Schering-Plough increased the ad budget of its Tropical Blend line 44% to $2.1 million, and similarly continued to push its Shade products with $2 million in measured spending, up 41.2% from 1981.

Sales of the company's footcare division, marketed as Dr. Scholl's, fell sharply to below 1980 levels, registering a 19.7% drop from 1981 to $103 million. According to the company, the drop came primarily because of a decrease in Exercise Sandal sales and the divestiture to Miller Shoe Co., which included the Scholl inventory of finished leather shoes and raw materials, Scholl retail outlets and certain trade names.

Scholl's Sashay sandals, with a more flexible sole than Exercise sandals, were introduced nationally in 1982. The product previously had been available in only about 40% of the country. Ad spending for Scholl's shoes was up 83% to $3.9 million, taking more than $1 million from spending on its footcare products, which dropped 25% to $3.8 million.

Scholl's also dropped its agency. The company cited a need to "consolidate" its advertising as the reason for firing N W Ayer, Chicago, in May, 1982. Scholl products went to Ted Bates Advertising, New York, with new-product work to be continued by Bates' subsidiary, Stern Walters/Earle Ludgin, Chicago. Media buying will continue to be handled by Schering-Plough's inhouse agency, Lake-Spiro-Shurman, Memphis.

In November, 1982, the company also eliminated Foote, Cone & Belding and Marschalk Co. from its roster. The Bloom Agency, Dallas, picked up products from both agencies—Moisture Whip cosmetics from Marschalk, and Aftate, Feen-a-Mint, Solarcaine and Tropical Blend from FCB.

Warwick Advertising, New York, added St. Joseph aspirin-free analgesic tablets for adults, which had been handled by FCB, to its St. Joseph account. Warwick also gained Coppertone Shade products and Regutol laxative from the agency. From Marschalk, Warwick added Maybelline's Ultra-Slim lipstick, Brush/Blush brands, Kissing Glosses, Shine and Shape, Cover Stick and new products. It is estimated that Bloom captured almost $20 million in business. Spending on the Warwick additions was not disclosed. The company sold one of its subsidiaries, Dap Inc., to Beecham Group PLC, London, for $70 million in March, 1983. Schering-Plough said it sold the home products business to better concentrate on its healthcare and cosmetics subsidiaries. Reports say the subsidiary was worth $41 million; Schering-Plough spent $996,000 in measured advertising for Dap in 1982, up 21% from the previous year.

AA calendar year estimate

Joseph E. Seagram & Sons, New York, a subsidiary of Seagram Co. Ltd., Montreal, and the 44th largest national advertiser, is estimated to have spent $153 million on domestic advertising in 1982, a 5.5% increase over the previous year.

Seagram Co. Ltd., is the world's largest marketer of distilled spirits and wines, and markets some 175 distilled spirit brands and 300 wines, champagnes, brandies, ports and sherries through subsidiaries and affiliates in 29 countries.

The company reported worldwide advertising and sales promotion expenses of $263 million for fiscal 1982, a 9% increase over fiscal 1982 (ended July 31). For the six months into fiscal 1983, worldwide advertising and sales promotion expenses were $141 million, a 3% increase over the comparable six-month period in fiscal 1982.

Worldwide sales for fiscal 1982 were $2.8 billion, a 2% hike. Net income was $279 million, compared with $1.5 billion in fiscal 1981, when gains realized from the sale of Seagram's U.S. gas and oil holdings were included.

The company, which increased its equity interest in E.I du Pont de Nemours and Co. to 21.3%, now reports annual results for the fiscal year ending Jan. 31, in order to incorporate year-end results for du Pont.

The domestic ad budget has stayed at pretty much the same level over the last three years, a sharp contrast with the late 1970s, when the budget got big increases every year and went from a 1977 level of about $30 million to an average of $150 million for the 1980-82 period. Its ad spending has leveled off but there's been a lot of shifting in media strategy. Not long ago, ad money was allocated evenly between consumer magazines, newspapers and out-of-home media. Then with the big ad increases of the late 1970s, the extra money was put into consumer magazines. By 1980, Seagram's magazine spending totaled nearly $90 million and constituted about a 75% share of the total ad budget. Magazines still get the biggest chunk of Seagram's ad money but are losing some of that dominance to other media. Last year's magazine spending constituted about a 68% share of the total budget.

Seagram spent about $20 million on tv last year, just about all of it to promote its Paul Masson brand wines. The company is still a relative newcomer to tv because of prohibitions against liquor ads on that medium. It only began using tv a few years as it built up its wine holdings.

The new allocations strategy has also seen money moving out of the national editions of the major consumer magazines and into regional magazine editions and newspaper-delivered magazines. Ads for Seagram brands now account for about one-quarter of all the liquor and wine ads placed in regional magazine editions. The game plan here is to promote the bigger brands—V.O., Crown Royal, Chivas Regal, etc.—in national magazines, while promoting the smaller brands in regional editions.

The shift to a more regionally-concentrated strategy, marks somewhat of a return to the regional focus that characterized the company's media planning prior to the 1970's ad increases, and when newspapers were a bigger element in the mix.

Gainers in Seagram's new media strategy include TV Guide, the women's magazines and special interest publications, which are now picking up Seagram ad money previously spent on newspaper supplements.

Whatever the media plan, the sales slump continued in the liquor market in 1982 as sales declined 2.6%, which returned domestic liquor consumption to where it was in 1977. Industry forecasters expect sales to drop off another percentage point or two in 1983.

Business Week's annual ranking of the nation's leading liquor brands shows that of the top 63 brands, 40 suffered 1982 sales slumps. Seagram's top-of-the-line 7 Crown brand held on to the No. 3 position and continues to be the nation's top selling whisky, but it sustained a nearly 9% sales decline. The drop came despite an increase in measured media spending for the brand to over $9 million in 1983, up from the previous year's $7.8 million.

The sales loss for Seagram's V.O. brand was even worse (-11.6%), causing it to drop to No. 5 on the BW survey, down from 1982's No. 4 position. Brown-Forman's Jack Daniel's brand took over the No. 4 position with a 1% sales gain. Measured media spending for V.O. (and V.O. and Schweppes Club Soda) totaled $10.5 million, down from $13.2 million in 1981.

Other Seagram brands that showed sales declines were Seagram's gin (No. 10 on the BW list with a 5.6% sales decline); Kessler blended whisky (No. 27, with a 12% sales decline); Calvert extra (No. 31, down 10% in sales); Chivas Regal (No. 34, down 12% in sales); and Wolfschmidt vodka (tied for the No. 34 spot, and also down 12% in sales).

Seagram's gin received $5 million in measured media support last year, Kessler whisky got $2.4 million, Calvert Extra got $1.5 million, Chivas Regal got $5 million, and Wolfschmidt vodka received $3 million.

Bucking the industry trend and showing an 11% sales gain in 1982 was Seagram's Crown Royal brand (No. 33 on the BW survey). Helping it accomplish that was a hefty ad budget—$9 million in measured media support; and Lord Calvert Canadian (No. 32) kept its sales at the previous year's level and was backed with $3.1 million in measured support.

Other Seagram brands getting substantial ad dollars last year included: Christian Brothers brandy (receiving $3.3 million in measured media support), Glenlivet scotch ($2.2 million), Passport scotch ($3 million), and Jameson Irish whisky ($2.3 million). Leroux Irish Cream whisky, meanwhile, was introduced last year and backed with $1.7 million in measured support.

Over the last decade, U.S. drinkers have switched their drinking preference away from bourbon, scotch, Canadian, and other whisky blends to nonwhiskies such as vodka, gin and "status" liquors, and, of course, also to light beers and wines. Where a decade ago, whisky brands had a 61.5% share of the U.S. drinking market, versus 38.5% for nonwhisky. Now, nonwhiskies lead with a 53% share.

Keeping up with the changing consumer tastes, Seagram moved two new rum entries—Myers' Original rum cream and Captain Morgan spiced rum—into national distribution last year.

Combined measured media spending for the new entries totaled about $1.3 million and was split between magazine ads and outdoor. Ronrico Rum received nearly $3.6 million in measured media spending.

Along with bolstering its nonwhisky liquor lineup, Seagram continues to bolster its wine resources. Last year it consolidated its wine business under Seagram Wine Co., which encompasses Paul Masson Vineyards, Gold Seal Vineyards, Browne Vintner, and several imported wine segments. It started off 1983 by completing agreements with several U.S. wineries to be the distributor and marketer—via yet another newly established unit called American Classics Wine Co.—for their wines, including Merritt, Sage Creek, Bandiera and Chateau Chevalier.

Also in early 1983, Seagram shifted all the major marketing sales and administrative functions of the Paul Masson Vineyards subsidiary from California to New York.

Seagram now operates a total of 23 wineries around the world and is the world's second-largest wine producer. Interjecting a worrisome note, however, were the latest wine sales figures. The domestic wine market is now slowing perceptibly. The Paul Masson wines, however, have been holding on to their share of market, and the new low-calorie Masson Light wines are now in national distribution.

Backed by $6.3 million in measured media ad support, Masson Light wines registered sales of more than a million cases in 1982, their first year of national distribution.

The regular line of Masson wines also received Seagram's heaviest-yet ad splurge in measured media for wines of $6 million. Its theme line, "We will sell no wine before its time," is being delivered by British actor Sir John Gielgud, succeeding Orson Welles in the role.

Masson, in a spot for its light wines stressing taste and low-calorie content, has cast actress Donna Mills of tv's "Knots Landing." The biggest chunk of Masson's estimated $15 million to $20 million ad budget last year went into a heavy tv and print campaign introducing the light wine lineup.

Another strategy aimed at bolstering the Masson line was the decision to reduce its price to enhance competitiveness against Gallo, which increased prices.

Partager, a French wine backed by $2.6 million in measured media support, is on the verge of becoming a million-case brand. Introduced in 1980, it is now the largest-selling French wine in the U.S. Black Tower, a German wine backed by $4.3 million in ad support, meanwhile, scored solid gains in its markets. An even newer wine entry is Corkers Wine Spritzers which was test marketed in New England in the fall.

Along with building up its wine resources, Seagram is also looking to stir up new opportunities outside its traditional wine and spirits business. Early in 1982, it formed Westmount Enterprises as a product development and venture capital division. The new unit has already helped Seagram diversify into nonalcoholic beverages and specialty foods.

Westmount is overseeing a Seagram's joint venture with Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of New York, in which the two will jointly market a new line of premium quality mixers—ginger ale, club soda and seltzer—labeled as Seagram's Mixers. The new line has been successfully tested in New England markets and the line is expected to be introduced nationally by early 1984.

Westmount is also testing Feast for One, a line of gourmet frozen appetizers and entrees, and is considering getting into the franchised restaurant business.

Even as it diversifies, Seagram is also counting on expanding its overseas spirit and wine sales to help offset declines in the U.S. and Canada.

Seagram's continued to expand its overseas markets. It acquired Wilson Distillers Ltd. in New Zealand, that country's only whisky producer, formed Seagram Thailand with Thailand's leading spirits company, and introduced Crescent premium whisky in Japan.

In the social concerns area, Seagram's campaign urging moderation in drinking is now in its 49th year. The ad for the 1982 Christmas/New Year's holidays posed the question: "What to get for the person who's had everything" and gave the answer "a Taxi." For the July, 1983 holiday, it ran an ad headlined "The Fourth of July, Proceed with Caution." Another ad in the moderation campaign addresses the concern of drinking while pregnant.

Meanwhile, what has been called a "landmark" study that Seagram jointly conducted with Time Inc. over a three-year span, was published last year. It confirmed the positive effects that advertising has on sales.

Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago, the nation's second largest advertiser, increased national ad spending 16% in 1982 to $631.5 million, as the nation's No. 1 retailer continued to strengthen its cornerstone, the merchandise group, while accelerating efforts to become a dominant consumer financial services company.

Operating revenue for the retail giant increased 9.7% to $30 billion, reflecting for the first time a full year's operating results of Coldwell Banker & Co. and Dean Witter Financial Services, which were acquired in 1981. Additionally, the Sears merchandise group and Allstate Insurance group had revenue increases.

The domestic merchandise group provided the lion's share of the take with a total of $18.78 billion, an increase of 3% from the previous year's $18.22 billion. Net income for the merchandise group was $456 million, up a healthy 29.5% from 1981's $352 million. Merchandising sales represent 62% of the company's total revenues.

Total ad spending for the merchandising group increased 6% to $719 million compared to 1981's $680 million. An estimated $30 million in catalog costs brought the merchandise group to about $749 million.

Included in the company's total ad spending is an estimated $236.7 million in newspaper advertising, down from $343.4 million spent during 1981. These figures are included in the unmeasured portion of Sears' total ad spending. An estimated $118.3 million of this also was spent on local rather than national advertising.

Last year the merchandise group made some significant changes and continued a successful revitalization effort. Sears pared back some unprofitable product lines, developed new apparel and hard good lines and began a series of agency changes that were carried further into 1983.

In addition, Sears continued laying the groundwork for its "store of the future" concept by testing new plans and designs in selected outlets. The retailer officially unveiled the first "store of the future" this July in King of Prussia, Pa., and four other stores will be constructed before the end of this year.

Sears' hardware line continues to dominate systemwide store sales by providing nearly 70% of the chain's yield. Strong players are Craftsman tools and auto batteries which control 70% and 40%, respectively, of those hardware markets.

Although Sears holds only a 3% market share in the apparel segment, it continues to do well with its own "signature" clothing lines. The Cheryl Tiegs line of women's sportwear and the Arnie Palmer group of men's sportwear are prospering. In 1982, the Tiegs line had sales of more than $200 million. In addition, the company introduced clothing bearing the name of tennis pro Evonne Goolagong. Sears continued securing brand name suppliers via an agreement with American Telephone & Telegraph that allowed the retailer to begin marketing Bell PhoneCenter outlets within its stores.

It was the first time AT&T used an outside distributor to sell its phones. Testing began in five Indianapolis, Ind., Sears stores and is currently being integrated into the other 851 units nationwide. In 1981, Sears began carrying more brand names, including Levi's apparel, products of Eastman Kodak Co. and Wilson Sporting Goods.

The company also started opening more freestanding specialty stores. In May it announced plans to speed up construction of business computer stores and added on an estimated 45 units to the five already in existence. Those stores service 17 new markets. The stores also carry brand names, including IBM, Vector and Saxon along with Sears computers. It has also started testing freestanding hardware and paint stores.

But Sears' biggest change is yet to come. For the past two years it has been testing, at four locations, a new retailing concept dubbed the "store of the future." Those stores have been reshaped to carry a totally new look and personality apart from the traditional Sears.

One of the new attractions is boutique settings for apparel and other soft goods within the main store. Additionally, appliances and other hard goods (such as tires) are displayed in warmer, room settings or in arrangements that are less formidable than before. Other changes: Ceilings have been lowered to decrease the warehouse look and feel; beige walls have been painted over with warmer, muted colors and harsh fluorescent lighting has been replaced with more indirect lighting.

The company will have a total of five "stores of the future" by the end of 1983 and is targeting massive changes over the next five years for most of the 851 units. As a direct result of this new concept Sears has made some ad agency changes designed to give it a more unified look and appeal, according to the company.

The merchandise group dismissed J. Walter Thompson and Foote, Cone & Belding in April, 1983, and split its estimated $130 million national advertising account between Ogilvy & Mather and Chicago-based Needham, Harper & Steers/USA. The change divided Sears' estimated 820 product lines into "hard" and "soft" goods. JWT lost the home improvement line and Foote, Cone & Belding lost the automotive/recreational line. O&M works on the hard lines of appliances, home entertainment, home improvement and auto/recreational. NH&S handles the soft goods, including home fashion and apparel.

Other agency shifts came in mid-1982 when Sears consolidated its $35 million apparel advertising business under NHS/USA thereby dismantling a triumverate that included Chicago's Foote, Cone & Belding, women's apparel; Stern Walter/Earle Ludgin, children's clothing and McCann-Erickson, men's apparel.

Also last year, it was determined that the number of local ads bought by individual stores would be tapered, and more color ads in local papers would be placed at the corporate level. The ratio is now roughly one national ad per week and one local ad, according to the company.

New tv advertising to support the merchandise lines is to break this fall, and all efforts will employ the new umbrella slogan, "There's more to your life at Sears." Ads will focus on goods and sales, but they will also begin selling the "new Sears," according to the company.

Additionally, Sears has commissioned NHS/USA to create an over-all "image" campaign for its merchandise group which could tally between $15 million and $40 million in ad spending. Those ads are also expected to appear in the fall.

Another hotbed for last year's marketing activities was the Sears financial service subsidiaries, designed to capitalize on the giant retailer's consumer base of 37 million households.

The retailer has incorporated financial service centers in nearly all its mall and major freestanding stores. These centers offer the services of Allstate Insurance, realtor Coldwell Banker & Co. and Dean Witter investments. As an added inducement, Sears is giving those who purchase a home via Coldwell Banker discounts of up to 25% on the purchase of appliances.

In 1981, Sears paid $607 million for Dean Witter, the nation's fifth largest brokerage house, and $179 million for Coldwell Banker. Dean Witter posted 1982 revenues of $1.4 billion and net income of $16.2 million. Measured spending was $3 million.

The Coldwell Banker Real Estate Group, which includes real estate, mortgage and development interests, contributed total revenues of $533.1 million, compared to 1981's $165.9 million. The difference was the inclusion in 1982 of Coldwell Banker & Co., Realtors to the Sears lineup of companies. It alone contributed $363.2 million of total revenues of the group whose net income, however, was $45.8 million compared to $86 million for 1981. The decrease was primarily the result of the recession and the stalled housing market, according to the company. The Allstate Insurance Group totaled $7.5 billion in sales in 1982, up 10%. Net income was $500 million last year, an increase of 19%. Sears spent an estimated $15 million in measured media for Allstate.

The company is attempting to play up the link between these services and Sears. Many consumers still are unaware that these financial entities are part of Sears, so the company has launched a tv campaign, using actor Hal Holbrook as spokesman. The spots explain what all three groups under the financial service umbrella offer. Foote, Cone & Belding, Chicago, handles. Ad spending for that effort will range between $15 million and $40 million.

Norton Simon Inc., New York, which became part of Esmark Inc. in a stock tender offer in June, 1983, was the 33rd largest advertiser in 1982 with ad expenditures of $191.2 million, an increase of 27.6% from the previous year.

NSI worldwide sales improved slightly to $2.9 billion and earnings increased 4% to $107.7 million, an increase generated by income from discontinued operations, a strong performance from NSI's food segment and an extraordinary gain from an exchange of a new issue of convertible preferred stock.

NSI suffered a 33% decline in profit from continuing operations, a decline not "entirely unexpected," says the company. In 1981, it predicted no turnaround in the economy and trouble in both domestic and foreign markets.

Norton Simon, a leading consumer goods producer in food, toiletries and liquor categories, pulled Chicago-based Esmark into a bidding war for the company earlier this year following purchase/stock offers to buy the company coming first from NSI chairman David J. Mahoney and later by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., a New York concern that specializes in arranging leveraged buy-outs. Esmark's winning tender was worth $973 million.

During the year, NSI's food segments experienced slight gains in sales, 0.2%, to $990 million and a slight earnings increase.

Hunt-Wesson, which dominates the division, had its most profitable year, taking advantage of a small tomato crop and relatively stable commodity prices.

It reported that market share gains were achieved by its "primary tomato-based food products"—the company spent $8.1 million in measured media spending on ketchup, tomato pastes and sauces compared with only $3.7 million in 1981.

Other strong performances noted by the company came in convenience foods, including Orville Redenbacher's Gourmet Popping Corn and Manwich sloppy joe sauce.

Hunt introduced a new Italian-style tomato paste, while Wesson Oil was packaged in a new easy grip bottle.

Wesson Oil, which received the food segments heaviest advertising support, got $9.6 million, a 30% increase from 1981 outlays in measured media. All spending was in network or spot tv, according to Leading National Advertisers.

The company gave one of its biggest boosts to expenditures for sunflower oil, Sunlite, from $3.4 million to $8.1 million.

Hunt's Manwich sloppy joe sauce received $6 million in measured ad support, up 40% from 1981 expenditures. Orville Redenbacher's gourmet popping corn received $6.5 million in measured media support, 20% more than the previous year.

The company's Avis unit continued to perform poorly. Earnings were off and the unit experienced a loss of $35 million.

The company attributed the loss to reduced rental volumes during the second half of the year, high interest rates and the over-all weakness of the economy.

The company also noted that airline traffic, which accounts for 75% of its domestic volume, has been on the decline for two years.

Avis looked to stabilize its management by choosing Joseph V. Vittoria to succeed Howard Miller as president. Mr. Vittoria, a 22-year veteran of the rent-a-car business, was also one of the principals in a suit filed by the company's archrival Hertz.

In the suit, Hertz charged Avis with unfair trade practices and said that former Hertz executives—including Mr. Vittoria—had taken confidential papers with them when they moved to Avis.

On the advertising front, Avis spent $17 million on two campaigns. The company's licensees conducted a $7 million campaign touting a premium promotion while Avis corporate continued to emphasize service through commercials and print ads featuring Mr. Mahoney.

NSI's cosmetics and fashion segments had its third consecutive year of sales and profit increases. Sales rose slightly from $617.6 million to $625.7 million while profits were up from $25.2 million to $27.5 million.

Only one product in the cosmetics division, Epris perfume, with $2.5 million in advertising, received than a six-figure support in measured media.

Max Factor & Co.'s U.S division continued its turnaround from its poor performance during the late 1970s. Halston Fragrances had its sixth consecutive year of record results. Max Factor put its marketing emphasis on its colorfast, waterproof, whipped creme products, Maxi products brands and two skin treatment products under the Skin Principle logo.

Halston premiered a comprehensive fashion collection for J.C. Penney Co. Penney is giving the line what the company called the biggest marketing effort in its history. Halston toiletry products received $2.4 million in measured media spending, up 33% from the previous year.

Somerset Importers Ltd., NSI's distilled spirits subsidiary, experienced an 0.4% drop in sales to $241.8 million and a 2% decline to $44.6 million in profits.

The company said its performance was a reflection of a slowdown in sales caused by inventory reductions made by retailers and wholesalers who were responding to high interest rates. The company enhanced its profitability by instituting price increases in 1982.

Somerset's Johnny Walker Black received $4.7 million in measured ad support, compared with $3.8 million in 1981, and Johnnie Walker Red got $6.6 million compared with $5.7 million the year before. Tanqueray London gin was backed with $3.9 million, an 11.4% increase.

SmithKline Beckman, a Philadelphia-based healthcare and high-technology company, is the 68th largest national advertiser in the U.S. Last year, the company spent an estimated $89.5 million on advertising, 0.2% more than the previous year.

Sales for the company in 1982 reached $2.969 billion, 12% more than in 1981. Earnings jumped 13% to $667.3 million. Financial figures for 1981 were restated to reflect the merger in March, 1982, with Beckman Instruments, which markets precision medical and industrial instruments.

Aside from the Beckman merger, the major moves occurred in the ethical drug area—drugs prescribed by doctors—with the introduction of Tagamet into Japan and the rollout in Argentina, West Germany and several other countries of Ridaura for the treatment of rheumatoid arthritis. Introduction of Ridaura into the U.S. is expected this year.

Tagamet remains the largest-selling drug in U.S. history. It accounted for more than half of the company's ethical drug sales in 1982 and more than a fourth of the company's revenues. Ethical drug sales reached $1.3 billion in 1982 with gastrointestinal sales, mostly credited to Tagamet, bringing in $857 million.

Recently, Tagamet's therapeutic attributes were given a further vote of confidence by the Food & Drug Administration when it approved the drug for "gastric ulcer disease" early this year. Tagamet had been used for treatment of duodenal ulcers, a malady that affects some 4 million Americans a year.

Gastric ulcers affect some 600,000 Americans a year. In Japan, however, the ratio is reversed, with gastric ulcers more prevalent than the duodenal variety.

High expectations associated with Tagamet's introduction in early 1982 into Japan were met. By December, 1982, it had become the leading gastrointestinal product in Japan, which delights corporate officials because they expect the Japanese pharmaceutical market to reach $20 billion in sales by 1990.

Not until recently has Tagamet been challenged in a substantial way in the U.S. That enviable position, however, has become vulnerable with the FDA approval earlier this year of the British drug Zantac.

Zantac, distributed by Glaxo, the U.S. unit of London-based Glaxo Holdings PLC, is Tagamet's first major U.S. competitor. Zantac has made a good showing against Tagamet in Italy and the U.K.

In the products area, under the Menley & James unit, sales were $169 million, off 9% from 1981's sales of $184 million. Causes for lower sales cited by the company included a weak economy, a mild winter and slower sales of appetite control products.

Menley & James' flagship brand, Contac cold capsules, slipped for the third year in a row in market share. According to A.C. Nielson Co. figures supplied by the company, dollar market share for Contac in 1982 was 13.6%, down from 13.9% in 1981, with unit shares down from 15.1% in 1981 to 14.4% in 1982.

Advertising spending for Contac, according to Leading National Advertiser figures, was down some 33%, from $11.1 million in 1981 to $7.5 million in 1982.

That decrease, however, says Victor Galef, vp-marketing for Menley & James, can be explained by a shift in strategy. Although ad spending for the main product was down, ad spending for a line extension, Contac Severe Cold Formula, went from $978,000 in 1981 to $5.9 million in 1982. "It was its second year and we decided to push it," says Mr. Galef. He adds that more money is being placed behind the line extensions because they are in the fastest-growing segments.

The big push, however, was for Ecotrin, a product that guards against aspirin's occasional stomach side effects. According to the company, consumers have responded strongly to the product and sales have more than doubled in the past two years. In 1982, there was a national launch of advertising—mostly tv—to support Ecotrin. The spots, via Ogilvy & Mather, use actor Eddie Albert ("Green Acres") as spokesperson.

This year, Mr. Galef says, the company is adding print to the mix. During 1982, ad spending for Ecotrin increased fourfold, from $1.4 million to $6.6 million.

Plans for this fall include two new line extensions for the Contac brand—one a cough capsule, and the other, Contac Severe Cold Formula night-strength liquid. Contac Severe Cold Formula is to be positioned directly against Contac's No. 1 competitor, Richardson-Vicks' Nyquil, presently the top product in the cold remedy category.

Ad spending for another consumer product, Dietac diet aids, was cut some 65%, going from $12 million in 1981 to $4.2 million in 1982. In partial explanation, Mr. Galef says that there "was a noted pullback in ads" for Dietac, as the previous year had been the introductory year.

Sales in SmithKline Beckman's eye and skincare category were up 25% in 1982, going from $139 million in 1981 to $174 million last year.

Allergan, according to the company, is No. 1 in the U.S. opthalmic and contact lens accessory products market.

Within the Beckman portion of the business, sales of diagnostic/analytic products and clinical laboratory services increased 31% from $621 million in 1981 to $815 million in 1982, with the healthcare group leading the way for sales gains.

Yet Beckman's industrial side did not fare as well, reflecting the shakey world economy. Sales in this sector were off, from $340 million in 1981 to $323 million in 1982.

million, a 2% increase over 1981's figure. An accounting change caused the restatement of both sales and income for 1981.

U.S. sales increased last year by 5%, from $1.03 billion to $1.09 billion. The per cent of sales derived from abroad has been steadily declining since 1980, from 47% that year to 45% in 1981 and 42% in 1982.

In the first quarter of 1983 Sterling's sales increased 7% to $442 million, from $415 million in the first quarter of 1982. Net income during that period declined by 7%, from $30 million to $28 million.

During the quarter there was a 16% increase in domestic sales, but a 6% decrease in foreign sales. W. Clarke Wescoe, chairman-ceo of the company, said new product sales and a turnaround in economic conditions in several European countries should allow Sterling's sales for the full year to improve over 1982.

Domestically, Sterling operates within five business segments: Proprietary products, household products, pharmaceutical specialties, chemicals and other products and environmental control.

Sales for proprietary products rose 4% in 1982, from $222.6 million to $230.9 million. Operating profits declined 9% to $37.7 million from 1981's $41.3 million. Glenbrook Laboratories is the marketing unit responsible for the major portion of business in the proprietary segment. Also included are the results of the consumer products division of Winthrop Laboratories.

Early this year Glenbrook introduced Panadol, a nonaspirin pain reliever, which has been sold overseas for 25 years. This is Glenbrook's second foray into the competitive nonaspirin field. Industry sources place Panadol's ad and promotional budget at $100 million. Panadol was introduced six months after the Tylenol tamperings. Bayer's advertising following the tragedies focused on the fact that the drug has been in tamperproof bottles for more than 25 years.

In addition to its advertising stance, Glenbrook is aggressively expanding the Bayer product line. Last summer the division rolled national with a micro-thin coating, for easier swallowing.

Early this year the company introduced Maximum Strength Bayer, and Arthritis Bayer timed-release aspirin was relaunched.

However, advertising for Bayer tablets declined by 24%, from $21.0 million in 1981 to $16 million last year. And advertising for Bayer aspirin for children fell 49% as the controversy over the link between aspirin and Reye's Syndrome, a disease usually affecting young children, persists.

In October, Stridex acne products and Medi-Quik first-aid spray were transferred from the Lehn & Fink group to Glenbrook. Ad spending for Stridex medicated pads increased by 105%, from $972,000 to $2 million.

While sales of Winthrop Laboratories' Neo-Synephrine were down, affected by a mild winter, ad expenditures grew to $5.1 million from $2.7 million for the 12-hour nasal spray.

Lehn & Fink Products accounts for nearly all the company's domestic business in the household and personal products segment. Sales in this division rose 8% to $423 million from $392 million in 1981.

Lysol received word from the Federal Trade Commission in March that it had lifted its flat ban on "helps prevent colds" for household disinfectant; that claim was dropped in 1974 following an FTC order. The product had a 16% increase in advertising, from $8.7 million to $10.1 million.

Lysol Pine Action cleaner rolled out nationally early this year; in 1982 it received $114,000 in ad money, all in spot tv while in test markets.

Also rolling national at that time was Pretty as a Picture decorative room air freshener. The brand received $1.8 million in advertising in 1982, the bulk in spot tv.

Sales for the pharmaceutical specialties unit rose $206 million in 1981 to $230 million. Operating profits shot up 46% to $38 million from $26 million. In new products, the division introduced Talacen, a pain reliever for mild to moderate pain. Early this year Talwin was reformulated to prevent misuse by drug addicts. Food & Drug Administration approval was given at the end of 1981 for the intravenous form of Inocor, a medicine for the treatment of congestive heart failure. The company is awaiting approval of the oral dosage of the drug.

AA estimate of calendar 1982 and 1981

Stroh Brewery Co., Detroit, the 90th largest national advertiser, entered the ranks of leading advertisers by acquiring Schlitz in the spring of 1982. Even though Stroh drastically cut Schlitz advertising, the over-all Stroh ad spending figure jumped to $55.6 million, an increase of 243% from the previous year.

Closely held Stroh had sales of $499 million, not including excise tax, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1982, but in buying the declining Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. in a carefully planned takeover scheme, it added about $494 million more to revenues.

Half a year before the Schlitz fight began in earnest, Peter Stroh, then president of his family-owned brewery, had termed the possibility of Stroh taking over Schlitz as "ludicrous." No one was laughing at Schlitz when the deal was concluded in May, 1982.

Schlitz beer sales continued to decline through 1982, according to Stroh execs. The flagship brand probably pulled down over-all Schlitz barrelage from the 1981 level of 14.3 million. Over-all barrelage for the company was 22.9 million bbls. sold during the fiscal year. Other Stroh beer brand shipments remained flat through 1982 at somewhere over 9 million bbls. After the acquisition, Stroh had a 13% market share and had become leader of the second-tier brewers, trailing by a large margin the dominating Anheuser-Busch Inc. and Miller Brewing Co.

Once it had control of Schlitz, Stroh moved quickly to install its own marketing style on the larger brewery. The suddenly sizable market share Stroh controlled gave it more clout with media and agencies.

In the summer of 1983, after the dust from several agency and executive shifts began to settle, Stroh dug in for a fight for better play on network tv. With an announced 1983 spending level of up to $60 million in network tv alone, the brewery went to the networks to demand time on big sports events that often went to A-B and Miller in exclusive packages.

To help in the fight, Stroh hired electronic media whiz David C. Martin from Campbell-Ewald, a Detroit-area ad agency. In his new position as director of corporate media and executive vp of Stroh Media Services, an in-house agency, Mr. Martin pledged to move more Stroh dollars into cable and other network tv alternatives even as he worked to get more network sports time.

When Stroh first got control of Schlitz, it set about selling Schlitz' Geyser Peak Winery for about $30 million. Stroh also put one of Schlitz' southeastern breweries on the block as required by the Justice Department when it approved the merger. The sale of those properties plus a large cash reserve at Schlitz helped pay off a sizable chunk of the debt Stroh incurred when it bought the bigger brewer.

The property sell-off was the least radical of the changes that took place at Schlitz. As expected, most of the top Schlitz officers left the company, including chairman Daniel McKeithan and ad-famous vice-chairman, president and ceo Frank Sellinger. More middle-level management departures occurred when Stroh moved Schlitz headquarters from Milwaukee to Detroit.

Even as it moved to change the Schlitz corporate structure and marketing attack, Stroh revamped its East Coast subsidiary, Schaefer. Stroh marketers aimed the New York-based brew at a younger audience in an attempt to rebuild the declining brand. The Schaefer ads from MCA Advertising, which broke in late summer of 1982, used a blind taste test angle with the theme, "Today's Schaefer is better than ever."

A slew of agency shifts began around the same time when J. Walter Thompson, Chicago, walked away from the Schlitz account. Stroh had rejected a new Schlitz campaign that was to run under the banner of "Gusto is here." JWT said it did not wish to participate in an agency review for the account that Stroh had initiated.

The Schlitz and Schlitz Light brands went without any real advertising for more than half a year as Stroh concentrated on capitalizing on stronger brands, including Old Milwaukee and Schlitz Malt Liquor. Schlitz brands got regional and spot advertising only as a tie-in to rock concert promotions.

MCA Advertising won the Schlitz account, worth much less than the $20 million-a-year spent on the brand prior to the acquisition.

Schlitz ads finally broke in late spring, 1983. The beer was aimed at young blue collar drinkers with the theme, "Go for it America, you've got the gusto now." The brand also got new, brighter packaging for the "relaunch," as Stroh executives called the new marketing.

During the unsettled state of the company immediately following the Schlitz acquisition, the company took the opportunity to switch agencies for the flagship brand, Stroh's. Doyle Dane Bernbach had created a popular, humorous approach for the regional brand. Ads had a light touch, unusual in premium beer marketing, turning around the theme, "From one beer lover to another."

Stroh retained the theme but let DDB go as it switched Stroh's to Marschalk Co. in late summer, 1982. Marschalk had gained the Stroh Light account from DDB a couple of years earlier after the latter botched Stroh Light's introduction.

New ads from Marschalk broke six months after the switch, using a quieter humor than some of the DDB efforts. Stroh was also testing a nonhumorous approach for Stroh's that it had first developed for radio—where humorous advertising for beer is less effective.

Stroh kept moving the Stroh's brand into new markets as it tried to take the brand national. Entry into the Southeast was followed by rollouts in Louisiana, Texas and the New England states in early spring of this year. Other brewers, including Adolph Coors Co. and Heileman Brewing Co., were gearing up for a beer war in the Southeast. Stroh executives said they would use Schaefer and Goebels as cut-rate brands to stave off any price-slashing tactics competitors might use.

While marketers were shaking up Stroh's and Schlitz advertising, they put more effort behind the growing Old Milwaukee and Old Milwaukee Light low-price beer and Schlitz Malt Liquor brands. Though a national brand, Old Milwaukee had received mostly regional ad support while under Schlitz. Stroh execs put it on network tv. Old Milwaukee's agency, BBDO, New York, was also named in the fall of 1982 by Stroh as the net tv buyer for all brands.

Stroh kept Benton & Bowles, New York, as agency for segment-leader Schlitz Malt Liquor. The malt liquor kept the battle-of-the-bands series of commercials with the crashing bull coming in as a punch line. Spending on the brand was scheduled to increase by 35% during 1983.

As it allowed marketing on Erlanger brand—Schlitz' ill-fated attempt to enter the superpremium market—to lapse, Stroh began rolling out its own superpremium, Stroh Signature. Tested initially in Stroh's home market of Detroit and parts of Michigan, Signature was pushed into Chicago and other markets in the fall of 1982.

Theme for the beer from agency MCA was "Stroh Signature is something extra." Stroh attempted to pick a niche in the superpremium market by aiming the brew at the "independent thinker who is more inclined to go out on his own and do his own thing," said John Bissell, group vp-marketing.

While over-all advertising at Stroh increased during 1982, measured advertising for Schlitz brand beer dropped drastically during the year to about $7 million from more than $17 million the previous year. Stroh controlled spending on the various Schlitz brands for only about half of the year. Schlitz Light got better treatment, as ad spending creeped up to more than $3 million. Old Milwaukee climbed to about $11 million from just under $8 million in 1981. Schlitz Malt Liquor increased slightly during 1982 to around $6 million ad spending from $4.6 million. Erlanger got almost no ad support during the year. Schlitz had spent around $3.3 million on it the year before.

The Stroh's brand measured ad spending remained about level at $9.6 million while Stroh Light climbed to $5.2 million from around $2 million. Stroh Signature got around $2 million in ad spending, concentrated in Michigan. Goebel, a regional low-price brand, got about $500,000 in ad spending. Schaefer brand dropped to $1.8 million from $3.8 million as it waited for its new campaign to get under way through much of 1982.

In minor agency action, Stroh switched agencies for Piels beer from MCA to Wyse Advertising in Cleveland, which also handles Goebel. Spending on Piels during the year had been negligible. Stroh also retained the old Schlitz corporate ad agency, L.H. Howe of Lake Forest, Ill., to handle Stroh Brewery Co. corporate ads.

Time Inc., New York, the 49th largest national advertiser, decreased its advertising expenditures in 1982 by 8% from 1981 to $130.1 million, excluding the pro rata costs of advertising within its own magazines.

In 1982, Time Inc. had revenues of $3.56 billion, an increase of 8% from the year before, while net earnings totaled $153.1 million, up 3%. For the first quarter of 1983, that trend continued, as net income rose 4.3% to $46.2 million and revenues were up 31% to $249.6 million.

The company spent $94.3 million in measured media last year, a 3% increase over 1981, with spot tv displacing magazines as the No. 1 advertising medium in 1982. Time Inc. spent $30.3 million in spot tv, $30.2 million in magazines and $20.2 million in newspapers.

Network tv received $10.8 million in advertising expenditures from the company, with spot radio collecting $2.3 million, outdoor $317,900 and network radio $123,500.

A significant change in the company's structure was announced in May, one that should have a widespread impact on Time Inc.'s bottom line in the years to come. The diversified company, with interests in magazines, cable, video operations, book publishing, forest products and paper operations, announced at its annual meeting this year that it was spinning off its forest-products companies, which last year had a pre-tax drop in operating profit to $55 million from $107 million. Forest products accounted for $1.1 billion, or 32% of the company's 1982 sales.

The move was not a totally unexpected one, as the forest-products business has been victimized by a depressed economy over the past few years. J. Richard Munro, chairman of Time Inc., acknowledged to shareholders that the company has been thinking for some time of divesting itself of the forest-products division, but explained that it "would have been stupid" to try to make a sale during the recent tough years. He said, however, that the company now is showing signs of rebounding and that the plan to spin it off to shareholders should be successful.

While the divestiture of the forest-products division will have a significant effect on the company itself, it should have little impact on its overall advertising expenditures. Last year, Time Inc. spent $5,400 on its Temple-Eastex subsidiary, all of it on outdoor.

The decision to break off the forest-products division was prompted by a growing realization within the company that its expanding media activities needed a greater cash infusion than was manageable within the current confines of Time Inc.'s operations. "We never envisaged how cash-hungry our video operations would be," Mr. Munro explained earlier this year.

Indeed, video has been a booming—but expensive—business for Time Inc. in recent years.

Its cable system, American Television and Communications, is the largest in the country, with systems in nearly 450 cities in 33 states. Home Box Office, the pay-tv service, is also the largest in the country, and with its sister service, Cinemax, has more than 60% of the nation's pay-cable movie-service subscribers. (Company executives say that the number of HBO subscribers, now at 12 million, is increasing 25% a year, a figure that may explain why HBO is willing to spend an estimated $250 million this year on buying motion pictures.) Time Inc. also is developing an ambitious teletext service.

These advances have had their rewards. Eight years ago, the video group contributed 4% of the company's total revenues of $910.7 million and recorded a loss of $2.8 million. In 1982, video operations had an operating income of $166.2 million, 47% of the company total, and brought in 24% of the company's $3.56 billion revenues.

And those lofty totals may only be the beginning from this growing division. Last year, HBO joined with CBS and Columbia Pictures to form Tri-Star Pictures, a film production studio that plans to spend $400 million making 12 to 18 pictures a year. HBO also helped create an investment and movie-production program called Silver Screen Partners that aims to raise up to $125 million to finance approximately a dozen pictures. In exchange for exclusive pay-cable rights to the films, HBO has agreed to cover any box-office losses they incur.

The dominance in the pay-tv field by HBO—and its expansion moves into the film business—has some of its competitors crying monopoly. Two of them, Showtime and The Movie Channel, tried earlier this year to combine their service into a joint venture that would be competitive with HBO, but the Justice Department has filed an antitrust suit to block the venture.

In 1982, Time Inc. spent $9.95 million in measured media to advertise its video operations, the largest chunk of which—$8.4 million—went to exclusive advertisement of HBO. For the first time, the company spent money on a separate advertising campaign for its three-year-old Cinemax service, allocating $187,300 for the pay-tv channel, most of it for magazine advertising. The advertising for HBO went mostly to three $2 million-plus chunks to magazines, network tv and spot tv.

While Time Inc.'s video group was growing in 1982, its magazine division was far from dormant. The company's seven magazines—Time, People, Sports Illustrated, Fortune, Money, Life and Discover—brought in $720.4 million in advertising revenues last year, a figure that equaled one-fifth of all ad revenues collected in 1982 by the 116 magazines tracked by the Publishers Information Bureau. Time, with $256.4 million in ad dollars, was again the industry leader, and dominated its two newsweekly competitors, Newsweek and U.S. News & World Report, with a 48% market share.

Time spent $15.4 million on measured advertising last year, almost double the $8 million it spent in 1981. Most of that went to spot tv ($10.9 million) with the rest divided among network tv ($1.8 million), magazines ($1.5 million), newspaper supplements ($1.1 million) and network radio ($17,000).

Its other magazines spent the following amounts on advertising in 1982: Sports Illustrated, $6 million; People, $12.9 million; Fortune, $795,000; Money, $548,000; Life, $1.1 million, and Discover, $978,000.

The company introduced TV-Cable Week in 1982, a magazine that is expected to cost $100 million to market and produce over the next five years. In July, the company named S. Christopher Meigher, 36, new publisher of the fledgling magazine.

Time Inc. is also looking at two other possible publications, one a life style magazine, the other an "upscale" book. The company has also confirmed that it has taken a look at Working Woman as a possible acquisition.

Less positive was the news last year from the Books Group. Although in 1982 revenues of $485 million made it one of the largest book publishing operations in the world, it contributed little to Time Inc.'s operating profit last year. Only Book-of-the-Month Club had any success last year, as it achieved its highest net sales and earnings in its 56-year history. Meanwhile, Time-Life Books operated at a significant loss and Little, Brown ended 1982 marginally in the black. Over-all, the Books Group had an operating income of $1 million last year, compared with the $21 million it earned in 1981.

Time Inc. spent $21.2 million advertising its various book operations in 1982, almost all in magazines. Of that total, $11.5 million went to promote Time-Life Books, $5.7 million was spent on Book-of-the-Month Club and its various subsidiaries, and $2.4 million was spent on Little, Brown.

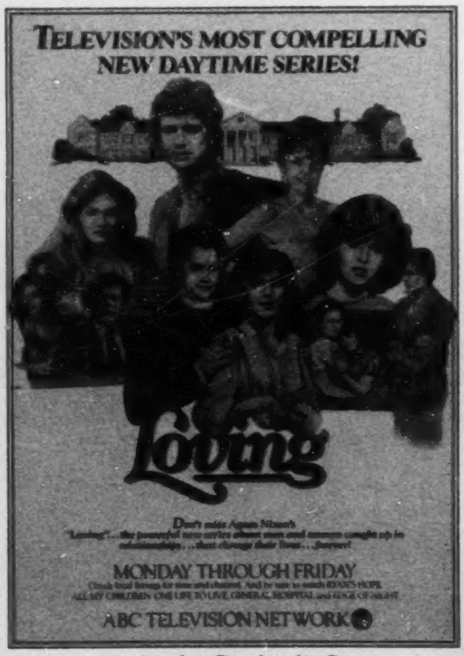
100 LEADERS

Odds and Ends



American Broadcasting Cos.

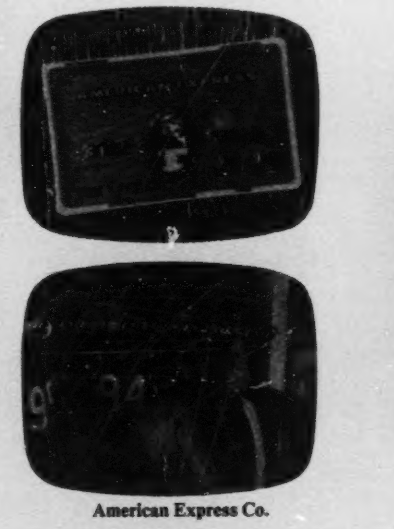
The Americans

The most commonly used word in 100 Leader company names is, perhaps not surprisingly, American. Patriotism, one might say, is something these corporate giants like to wear on their logos. And of those eight that make this list, one even has a parent who is Japanese.

By the way, there would have been nine, but American Airlines decided to change its name to AMR Corp.

The eight companies are:

- American Brands
- American Broadcasting Cos.
- American Cyanamid Co.
- American Express Co.
- American Home Products Corp.
- American Honda Motor Co.
- American Motors Corp.
- American Telephone & Telegraph Co.



American Express Co.

Seagram Co. Ltd.

The 'Foreigners'

On the other hand, there are those companies that have parents or are closely affiliated with foreign companies. In most cases, you'd never be able to tell just by looking at their names.

Here they are (with parent or affiliate in parentheses):

- American Honda Motor Corp. (Honda Motor Co., Ltd., Tokyo)
- American Motors Corp. (Regie Nationale des Usines Renault, Boulogne, France)
- Batus Inc. (B.A.T. Industries PLC, London)
- Beecham Group Ltd., Middlesex, United Kingdom

- GrandMet USA (Grand Metropolitan PLC, London)
- Mazda Motors of America (Toyo Kogyo Co., Hiroshima)
- Miles Laboratories (Bayer AG, Leverkusen, West Germany)
- Nestle Enterprises (Nestle SA, Vevey, Switzerland)
- Nissan Motors Corp., U.S.A. (Nissan Motors Co., Tokyo)

Toyota Motor Sales, Torrance, Cal., the 58th largest leading national advertiser, is estimated to have increased its advertising expenditures 7.3% to $111.3 million in 1982.

The sole stockholder in the company is Toyota Motor Corp., a new corporate entity formed on July 1, 1982, with the merger of Toyota Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Sales Ltd. of Japan.

It was a difficult year for Toyota Motor Co. as unit sales declined in Japan and overseas by 3% to 3.2 million. As the recession continued, consumer demand for automobiles softened. Exports suffered a 7.9% decline to 1.7 million units.

Despite this, Toyota Motor Corp. reported worldwide sales of $15.09 billion in fiscal 1982, a 9.8% increase over 1981 levels. The rise was mainly attributed to increased sales of higher-price models and the favorable impact of the weakening of the yen on the value of export sales. These factors, combined with company cost-reduction programs, led to a sharp gain of 34.6% in income. Net income grew by 6.7% to $555.3 million.

In the U.S., which accounts for around 50% of the company's exports and 25% of its total business, Toyota maintained its position in 1982 as the best-selling import car and truck, but began to feel the pinch of the voluntary restrictions limiting the number of vehicles exported to the U.S.

It also faced strong competition from other imported car companies and to a certain extent from Detroit, which managed to retake a healthy share of the small truck market from the imports with several minipickup models.

The Japanese auto maker sold 674,554 cars and trucks in the U.S. during 1982, a decline from the previous year's 714,020 levels. The company's share of the import car market in the U.S. shrank slightly to 23.8% from 24.4% in 1981.

The company ranks third in worldwide production of motor vehicles, behind General Motors and Ford and followed by Nissan. Toyota's share of the total U.S. car market is around 6%.

The Corolla was once again Toyota's sales leader in 1982, accounting for around 33% of the company's U.S. sales volume. First introduced in 1966, the Corolla has gained wide acceptance among drivers both in Japan and overseas. In 1979 it became the first Japanese automobile to exceed the 7 million mark in aggregate model production, and, for five years in a row it held the record as the world's top production model, a position it regained in 1980 and maintained through 1982.

Print and tv ads for Corollas focused on the new features of a car that remained unchanged in design from 1982 models. The ads, which pointed to the differences in the 1983 version (a more efficient engine, new suspension and interiors), featured actors in the roles of cartoon characters Olive Oyl and Popeye.

The redesigned line of four-wheel drive Tercels received the lion's share of Toyota's 1983 introductory ad budget. Tv commercials focused on the new Tercel four-wheel wagon, which was said to be loaded with so many new features that its four-wheel drive capability represented only the "tip of the iceberg." To graphically illustrate that point, the car was photographed atop Alaska's Columbia glacier.

Toyota also introduced a new GTS version of its sporty Celica model line using print ads and tv commercials featuring songwriter/personality Paul Williams and race driver Dan Gurney. Mr. Gurney also promoted the Celica Supra, which was positioned as a performance sports car. The commercials featured a Celica undertaking a grueling drive to the 14,000-ft. summit of Pike's Peak. Theme for the Supra ad was "The right stuff."

As in the past, Toyota's over-all theme for all its lines was "Oh what a feeling!"

Toyota's small, fuel-efficient pickup trucks continued to receive heavy emphasis, as the company's only product line not subject to restrictions. The company spent more than 13% of its total media budget on the truck lines, with expenditures reaching the $15 million level.

Competition within the segment accelerated. Nissan, U.S. distributor for Datsun trucks, cut the price of its standard pickup by 4.7% to $5,858. Mazda Motors of America also cut the price of its minipickups to $5,795, making them the lowest-price units available in the country. Toyota came out with a a base minipickup model, priced at $5,998, or 4.8% below the $6,298 list price of the old, standard pickup.

While Toyota continues to hold the top spot among the Japanese in the small truck market and increased total truck sales over 1981, it has been losing share to American truck manufacturers. Chevrolet's S10 and Ford's Ranger—which are slightly larger than their Japanese counterparts and offer more power at competitive price points—continue to show strong sales at the expense of some import companies, and have expanded the total small-truck segment.

In 1981, Toyota and Ford Motor Co. tabled plans for joint production of a car they could produce in the U.S., but 1982 saw the start of similar discussions between General Motors and the Japanese car company. In early 1983, Toyota and GM signed an agreement calling for a joint venture to produce a small car at GM's facility in Fremont, Cal. If it comes to pass, it will represent the first time a Japanese and U.S. company have agreed to work together to make a car in this country.

Under the agreement, Toyota and GM will produce a new subcompact that is a variation of Toyota's front-wheel drive replacement for the Corolla. The Toyota version will be introduced in the fall of 1983; the GM-Toyota model is expected to be introduced in the 1985 model year.

Whether the deal will actually happen is uncertain at this time. There are at least two potential stumbling blocks. First, the Federal Trade Commission must give its approval (it is currently reviewing the deal on the basis of antitrust) and, second, a labor agreement with the United Auto Workers must be successfully negotiated.

Trans World Corp., New York, the nation's 66th leading advertiser, spent $91.6 million on advertising in 1982, a 3.8% decrease from 1981.

The company showed a 2.9% loss in revenues to $5.11 billion for 1982, as net income also dropped, declining to $29.9 million, 51.4% less than 1981 earnings of $61.6 million.

The company had a tough year in 1982 with only one of its subsidiaries, Spartan Food Systems, showing a clear increase in profit. Spartan had a pretax net income of $39.2 million, up 21% from 1981.

The company's other subsidiaries did not fare as well. Century 21 Real Estate and Hilton International Co. profits' were down; profits for Canteen Corp., remained virtually unchanged.

The company's biggest unit, Trans World Airlines (TWA), slipped further into the red, showing a pretax loss for the fourth straight year, from $28.2 million to $44.5 million. TWA's domestic market share fell from 9.3% in 1981 to 8.7% in 1982, sources say.

For the first two quarters of 1983 TWA lost $108.9 million, of which $16.2 million came in the second quarter. The company attributed the drop to reduced domestic traffic and an increase in payroll expenses.

TWA's advertising spending fell from $55 million in 1981 to $49 million in 1982. Ad campaigns continued in the price-cutting vein, as TWA followed competitors by offering a $99 fare to major cities. In other advertising, the airline emphasized its Ambassador Class, positioned as a middle-of-the-road alternative; it is priced slightly higher than coach fares (with more services, as well), but lower than first-class. TWA also reintroduced its Kids Fly Free program, which ran from January through March, 1983.

Due to the company's increasing reliance on its smaller—but more profitable—subsidiaries to offset the increasing debts of TWA, industry sources predict that the corporation may divest itself of the carrier. Earlier this year, the company put up for sale 3.3 million shares of new stock and 1.7 million of held (but not traded) TWA stock, decreasing Trans World's percentage of ownership from 100% to 84%.

Profits of Hilton International Co. fell 23.4% in 1982 from their record level of $73.4 million in 1981 to $56.3 million in 1982. About 75% of that decline can be attributed to the fluctuation in foreign currency rates, according to the company. In addition, overall, the occupancy rate for the hotels fell three percentage points in 1982, to 68%.

Hilton spent a total of $935,000 on measured advertising, down 43% from 1981, according to Leading National Advertisers.

The hotel chain continued to expand in 1982, with four new units opening under the Hilton International name. Also, a Vista International opened in Washington in January, 1983; another is scheduled to open in Kansas City, in 1984. There are eight additional hotels under construction.

Century 21 Real Estate continued to suffer from the recession-ridden housing market. The company posted pretax profits of $5.9 million in 1982, down 36% from 1981. As of Oct. 1, McCann-Erickson, Los Angeles, will take over as agency of record for the company; Wells, Rich, Greene, Los Angeles, handled advertising in 1982.

Century 21, the No. 1 franchise real estate organization in North America, emphasized its variety of services in its 1982 advertising, including its ability to help potential home buyers find alternative financing. Advertising expenditures dropped 5.8% to $2.8 million, or about 8.2% of revenues, according to the company.

Century 21 expects to expand its services in 1983 by offering homeowner's insurance, real estate syndication and mortgage brokerage.

Canteen Corp., one of Trans World's two foodservice wings, showed a slight decrease in profits in 1982, down 0.4% from 1981 to $22.9 million. The recession continued to cut into company profits, as fewer people ate at Canteen's industrial outlets because of the depressed manufacturing industry.

Canteen has three subsidiaries, Dunhill Personnel System, an employment placement agency; Rowe, a cigaret vending service, and Milnot Co., processor and distributor of a canned milk-based product and other foodstuffs. Milnot introduced a new sweetened condensed milk product line.

Spartan Food Systems, the company's other foodservice subsidiary, is parent company to Quincy Family Steak Houses and a franchise of Hardees restaurants. In 1982, Spartan added 17 units to its Hardee's holdings, bringing the total to 259. Altogether, the Hardee's chain has 1,556 throughout the Midwest, Southeast and Mid-Atlantic region, as well as 609 Burger Chef units acquired from General Foods Corp. The chain had sales of $1.4 billion in 1982, making it the fifth-largest system, behind No. 4 Wendy's.

20th Century-Fox Film Corp., Los Angeles, is the 86th largest advertiser in the U.S., with total ad expenditures for its film, tv and telecommunications ventures of $65 million in 1982, an increase of 54.7% from the previous year.

Each of the divisions independently oversees its own operations including advertising and promotion. Measured media came to $35 million, a 54% increase in the seven media monitored.

According to recently released statistics of the closely-held company, 20th Century-Fox suffered a net earnings loss of $16.9 million on operating revenues of $560.7 million for the year ended Aug. 28, 1982. Full-year figures for 1981 are not available, but published figures covering eight months of 1981 (through Aug. 29) set net earnings at $40.4 million on operating revenues of $360.9 million.

Richard Ingber, senior vp-advertising for 20th Century-Fox, says the studio's major ad support went for "Return of the Jedi," the final release of the "Star Wars" trilogy, which opened May 25. The film, however, was marketed differently from the previous two "Star Wars" pictures. Four film trailers, or minifeatures, on the making of the film were made available to movie theaters six months before the film's release. Although the same media mix was used for "Return of the Jedi" as for the other "Star Wars" films, more print advertising was purchased in specialized science fiction and fan magazines.

Fox also made a departure in the promotion of the original "Porky's" in March, 1982. The initial $5 million promotion involved a sneak preview program, local promotions involving special events and national tie-ins. The 1983 release of "Porky's II" involved a larger percentage of spot tv advertising, and also included cross promotion for the "Porky's II" videogame from Fox Videogames, which represented the studio's first multiproduct campaign. Such campaigns are expected to become the standard.

"Quest for Fire," which was released slowly at just a handful of theaters, involved more spot tv and newspapers.

Mr. Ingber said other films that represented "a good ratio of dollars spent to dollars received" for Fox were "Max Dugan," "The Entity," "The Chosen" and "The Man From Snowy River."

Mr. Ingber said each campaign is tailored to the specific film but that the national launch of releases generally cost Fox between $3 million and $12 million to properly market films.

In the past several years, Fox films has been aggressively buying radio and has continued its interest in cable advertising on such narrowcast outlets as MTV: Music Television, USA, superstation WTBS-TV and the Entertainment Sports Programing Network (ESPN). Mr. Ingber said cable continues to offer Fox flexibility in the length and nature of advertising (including clips from films that might not be allowed to air on network tv). Fox also has directed a growing amount of its younger demographic advertising efforts to on-campus forums like The Wallpaper Journal which is posted on more than 1,000 campuses weekly, and in free campus magazines.

This fall Fox plans to take advantage of shared 30-second ads, now being accepted by at least two of the commercial networks, by promoting two of its films in a shared 30-second spot.

Mr. Ingber said Fox will have a unique advertising opportunity in 1984 because it has the exclusive movie rights to the 1984 Olympics. It is the only movie company which will be allowed to advertise during ABC's broadcast of the summer and winter games. It will be the first time that the release of Fox films will be scheduled on the basis of the promotion of those films during the Olympics. The Olympics agreement with ABC represents a $10 million commitment with a $2 million option.

In 1983, Fox plans to spend four or five times what it did in 1982 for overall advertising and promotion of tv series, shifting more of its ad spending from spot tv to network tv. This fall Fox will provide its first network advertising for tv properties in touting such new network series as the "M*A*S*H" sequel, "Emerald Point, N.A.S.," "Trauma Center," "It's Not Easy" and "Manimal." The initial campaign budget for each show will be $200,000-plus.

Fox will have eight network tv series on the air this fall, one-quarter of which are returning shows, including "Fall Guy" and "Trapper John, M.D."

Jeff Schadlow, vp of marketing and research for Twentieth Century-Fox Television, said his division cut down on publicity for its tv properties last year. It did, however, produce its own spots to promote the first full network season of the series adaptation of "9 to 5" on ABC. About $200,000 was spent to launch the series with endorsement spots (featuring recognizable ABC series stars, including John Ritter and Robert Wagner) appearing the first three weeks in the nation's top 10 markets.

About $3 million will be spent in 1983 on all forms of advertising of its network, syndicated and international tv properties, with an increased percentage going to advertising on network tv.

Advertising later this year and early next year may involve such techniques as viewer sweepstakes tied to the premiere of new series and special coupon promotions in cooperation with major product advertisers. Fox has not used either technique before. TV Guide and weekly tv logs will continue to be Fox's primary promotional tools for tv properties.

In the area of syndicated tv productions, Fox mainly provides the various independent and network affiliated stations airing the programs with film outtakes and other materials for them to construct their own promotions. Fox spends no media dollars of its own. Its syndicated properties included "Blood Feud" in 1983, "Helen Keller—The Miracle Continues" in 1984 and the continuing weekly series "Dance Fever." Fox also has worked with Showtime Entertainment to produce new episodes of "Paper Chase" for pay tv.

Fox has a similar marketing arrangement with broadcast outlets for its pay per view tv events, which during the past year have included the original "Star Wars" and the last concert of "The Who." The same marketing arrangement was applied to the redramatization of "Pygmalion," which Fox produced for Showtime and was broadcast this summer.

Fox tv internationally has entered into joint ventures with various studios based in London to produce more original, first-run programing for cable tv in the U.S. and in Britain. Fox Television also has aggressively been searching for advertisers and agencies interested in co-producing tv movies and other programing for network broadcast.

Following the lead of its film division, Fox tv will divert about 5% of its 1983 ad budget to cable tv. Fox also is poised for further pay tv involvement. Showtime, the No. 2 pay cable network, has been negotiating to form a partnership with Fox, ABC Inc. and Spotlight, another pay cable service.

In 1982, Fox also entered into the burgeoning videogame arena in a $100 million joint venture with CBS called CBS/Fox Inc. to produce and market videocassettes.

The studio was rocked late last year by the resignation of Sherry Lansing as president of 20th Century-Fox Productions after three years. She was replaced by Joe Wizan. Ms. Lansing was the first woman to have headed production for a major movie studio.

UAL Inc., Elk Grove Township, Ill., the 81st largest national advertiser in 1982, spent an estimated $78.7 million in advertising, an 11.6% increase from 1981's $70.6 million.

UAL is a holding company with four principal subsidiaries: United Airlines, Westin Hotels, Mauna Kea Properties (including the Mauna Kea Beach resort hotel in Hawaii and real estate holdings) and GAB Business Services (an insurance services and claims adjusting company).

Consolidated operating revenues for UAL were $5.32 billion in 1982, a 3% increase from 1981's revenues, reflecting the revenue increases registered by the airline, hotel and business-services subsidiaries. Primarily because of nonoperating items, UAL was able to report net earnings of $30.8 million in 1982 after reporting a net loss of $70.5 million the previous year.

Fare wars among the major carriers cut revenue yield per passenger mile for United Airlines, which showed a loss from operations for the fourth consecutive year. Increased productivity, increased use of larger planes (raising available seat miles) and aircraft reconfiguration combined to reduce 1981's loss of $148.8 million 55% to $66.7 million in 1982.

Net earnings for the airline in 1982 were $2.2 million, compared with a net loss of $104.4 million in 1981.

UAL's hotel properties, including the Westin chain and Mauna Kea property, continued to provide the bulk of the holding company's earnings. But the lodging industry was beset by the same recession-related woes as the airlines. Hotel property operating revenues rose 2% to $462.1 million in 1982, but net earnings dropped 15% to $30.2 million.

GAB Business Services' operating revenues increased 12% to $162.3 million, but increased operating costs left the unit with a net loss of $1.7 million, 6% greater than 1981's net loss.

Despite the operating losses, UAL's primary unit, United Airlines, managed to increase its market share 1.6 points to an impressive 21.3% in 1982. This was achieved primarily through addition of new routes (made possible by deregulation of the industry) and aggressive marketing to protect existing routes.

The primary problems faced by United and the other major airlines were a continuing recession that cut the over-all number of passengers coupled with the growth of new regional airlines seeking to establish a position in the marketplace through lower fares. But matching the fare slashing of other carriers cut into that increase, and average yield per passenger mile dropped 7% to 10.44 cents.

In November, 1982, United announced it was cutting supersaver fares between its Chicago base and West Coast destinations, effective the first week of 1983. But Pan Am went United (and the airlines that had announced they would match those new lower rates) one better in January. Pan Am, which lost $485.3 million in 1982, slashed one-way fares to all domestic destinations it serves to $99, and the price battles continued. By the summer of 1983, passenger traffic was rising as the economy improved. United and most others began phasing in new fare structures based on miles flown with the net result that ticket prices began to rise again.

This continual adjustment in fares on its many routes, often necessitating explanations of purchase restrictions, helps explain the dramatic rise in United's expenditures for spot tv, which jumped 23% from $16.7 million in 1981 to $20.6 million in 1982.

While it jockeyed fares to remain competitive, United continued its internal drive to increase productivity. By the end of the year, the airline had cut nearly 3,600 employes from its ranks, an 8% decrease.

Also as part of the productivity drive, United increased usage of larger-capacity aircraft and in September, 1982, became the first airline to fly the new Boeing 767. Seven of these 197-passenger jets were in operation by the end of 1982, with an additional 12 added this year.

A summer ad campaign for the 767 preceded its September introduction. The print campaign told passengers, "If you had a favorite airplane, this one's going to take its place."

had limited schedules and depressed earnings in 1981 no longer was a problem in 1982, but scheduling limitations during peak traffic periods at major airports remained. UAL chairman Richard J. Ferris said at the company's 1983 meeting that the removal of those restrictions by mid-1984 will allow United to boost flights into the airline's Chicago, Denver and San Francisco hubs.

United countered the limitations to flights at major cities by increasing the number of smaller locations served, a move made possible by increased route-selection freedom resulting from deregulation. In 1982, service was added to Albuquerque; Dallas/Fort Worth; San Antonio; Harrisburg, Pa.; New Orleans, Sioux City, S.D., and Syracuse, N.Y.

This year, United planned the addition of routes serving Albany, N.Y.; Austin and El Paso, Tex. Burlington, Vt.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Kahului (Maui), Hawaii; Louisville, Ky., and St. Louis. Nonstop service between Chicago and Anchorage began in June, 1983.

Advertising for all these routes included United's long-running "Fly the friendly skies" theme. United began a new campaign in January, 1982, targeted to frequent travelers. A series of prominent businessmen and women give their answers to the question, "Why do 100,000-mile fliers choose United Airlines?" Spots end with the theme, "People who fly for a living fly the Friendly Skies."

In June, 1982, United received clearance for the route it had been coveting for years, and in April, 1983, scheduled nonstop service from Seattle and Portland to Japan was inaugurated. In May of this year, United began its second trans-Pacific route, operating between Seattle and Hong Kong. Heavy initial ad support for the Tokyo flights was provided in Chicago, where the flights originate or terminate, and Japan, where introductory advertising stressed that United was the largest air carrier in the U.S.

The rise in United's total advertising expenditures also reflects increased support for its United AirExpress overnight package delivery business launched late in 1981. Tv and print ads in a major campaign begun last year featured talking packages arriving by cab at an airport and ready to take to the friendly skies. Nearly $10 million in network and spot tv advertising backed United's entry in this competitive field.

UAL's Westin Hotels unit, which had changed its name from Western International the previous year, faced a similarly challenging economic environment. Over-all average occupancy dropped 4.6 points from 1981's 77% to 72.4%, which the company maintained was still several percentage points above the industry average. Operating earnings were down 21% while operating revenues rose 2%.

Despite the recession, Westin completed several major construction projects that are part of a billion-dollar expansion program launched in 1980 and due for completion in 1986. Major additions were completed for the Westin Hotel, Seattle; the Carleton in Johannesburg, and the Arizona Biltmore in Phoenix.

A new resort was opened at Vail, Colo., which eventually will be a 400-room property when the The Westin Hotel, Vail, is completed in 1984.

The expansion program continued into 1983 with the planned openings of hotels in Boston, Dallas and Ottawa. A 535-room property near Chicago's O'Hare Airport is scheduled to open early in 1984.

Unilever U.S., New York, which includes Lever Bros., Thomas J. Lipton Inc. and National Starch & Chemical Corp., is the nation's 14th largest advertiser, spending an estimated $304.6 million in advertising in 1982, up 28% from 1981. Combined sales of the three companies totaled $2.95 billion, up 9% over 1981. Net income rose 15% to $91.8 million.

Parent companies Unilever N.V., Rotterdam, and Unilever PLC, London, noted that their U.S consumer products companies for 1982 made considerable progress toward putting Lever Bros. on firm ground, while Lipton maintained its record of progress.

National Starch net income showed a decline to $37.1 million in 1982 from $41.4 million a year earlier. Sales of that company rose to $692.0 million from $668.3 million.

Lever, the largest Unilever U.S. operation, reduced 1982 losses to $1.9 million from a net loss of $11.5 million in 1981, while sales rose 15% to $1.35 billion. The company invested $137 million in measured media last year to support its toothpaste, bar soap, dishwashing liquid and heavy duty detergent franchises.

Lever's household products division, which accounts for about two-thirds of the company's sales, made gains in all three of its major businesses. In laundry detergents, Wisk liquid, the No. 1 liquid heavy duty detergent, rose to an 8% market share, narrowing the slim gap between it and Procter & Gamble's Cheer, the No. 2 detergent in the $3 billion laundry detergent market. Liquids now account for about 25% of the total heavy-duty category and are the fastest-growing segment.

Concentrated All showed gains of more than 5%. The division repositioned All liquid as a value brand by dropping tv advertising and reducing pricing 20%. All powder received $10.7 million in measured media, while Lever's most heavily advertised detergent, Wisk, received $12.7 million.

In dishwashing liquids, Lever hit paydirt with Sunlight despite some problems with its introductory sampling program. A number of cases of accidental ingestion were reported after consumers mistook the lemon-scented liquid in a yellow bottle for lemon juice. Sunlight now has captured 8% of the market, more than doubling Lever's share of the total category, while Dove liquid and Lux liquid combined hold 6%. Spending for Sunlight during its introductory year exceeded $14.4 million, while Dove and Lux were unadvertised.

Lever bar soaps also performed well with Dove growing to 8%, Caress to more than 3.5% and Shield to more than 4%. The heaviest spending—$12.6 million—went toward expanding the company's business in the deodorant segment with Shield. Dove received $11 million in advertising and Caress $6.9 million.

In fabric softeners, Lever holds about 10% of the market with Final Touch, which received $8 million in measured media last year. Lever is testing a new product, Snuggle, positioned as offering softness at a lower price. Other household products put into test include Sunlight automatic dishwasher detergent and Surf heavy duty detergent.

Lever's personal products division showed mixed results as its dentifrice business suffered in the toothpaste war, while the division was heartened by the performance of two new brands, Impulse body spray and Dimension shampoo.

Despite ad investments of $18.8 million for Aim, $13.2 million for Close-Up and $2.5 million for Pepsodent, Lever lost market share as rivals P&G, Colgate-Palmolive and Beecham rolled out new gels and reformulations. For the first time, gels captured more than 50% of the $900 million dentifrice market. Aim fell to a 10% market share; Close-Up to 7% and Pepsodent held at about 3%.

Impulse body spray appears to be one of Lever's hottest new products in years. An import from overseas, the product claims the utilitarian benefits of deodorants/antiperspirants and the psychological benefit of fragrance. Sold in the deodorant section, it has captured close to 10% of the aerosol segment, which in turn accounts for about one-third of the total $1 billion category.

Ad support for the body spray last year totaled $10.9 million in measured media, using the ad theme, "Men just can't help acting on impulse."

Another personal product with significant ad backing, Signal mouthwash, had $4.4 million in measured media in 1982. The No. 4 brand, it holds a 10% market share.

The division's other promising new product, Dimension shampoo, has been expanded into 10% of the country. The company says it became the No. 1 beauty shampoo in Milwaukee, where it was tested.

For the foods division, 1982 was a year of cutting losses and restoring market shares, in part by restructuring the margarine business. The plan now is to continue adding new products to expand the division's base. Imperial margarine, the division's biggest brand, received $3.5 million in measured media last year. The division also markets Promise and Autumn margarines, which are not supported heavily in measured media.

The division supported Mrs. Butterworth's syrup with $3.2 million and began testing a pancake mix under the same name.

In 1982, Lever moved its tv spot buying activity out of J. Walter Thompson USA and split the $30 million business between BBDO and Ogilvy & Mather.

Unilever's major food entries in the U.S. come from Lipton, which spent some $40 million in measured media last year. The company reported sales of $912.9 million in 1982, up 6% from 1981, while net income was $56.6 million, up 14%.

Lipton, the leading U.S. marketer of dry soups and tea, is expanding into a number of segments in the beverage business and last year agreed to distribute G.D. Searle & Co.'s low-calorie sweetener Equal in food stores.

Lipton's biggest advertising expenditure last year, $14.1 million, went into teas, with tea bags receiving $6.2 million; herbal teas, $3.4 million; flavored tea bags, $1.4 million; iced tea mix, $1.2 million and low-calorie iced tea mix, $1.1 million.

Last fall, the company introduced a new theme for herbal teas, "Wind down with Lipton herbal tea . . . there's no caffeine."

Lipton's spent $13.5 million to support its dry soup business, with $7.5 million going into regular dry soups and $6.2 million into Cup-a-Soup instant mixes. The company holds well over 50% of the dry soup business, which totals about $350 million annually. Lipton's regular dry soup business is slightly larger than its instant soup business.

Lipton's Wish-Bone salad dressing received $3.2 million in measured media last year. Other significant measured media spending went into Knox gelatin ($2.2 million) and Lawry's seasonings, sauces, salad dressings and Mexican foods ($2.7 million).

In the new product arena, Lipton rolled national this summer with Sunkist chilled and frozen orange juice after signing for exclusive rights to the Sunkist trademark on a wide range of juices and related products. Sunkist fruit roll snacks were expanded regionally. Earlier this year, Lipton began testing English blend, a full-bodied blend of fine teas, and a 97% caffeine-free version of its regular tea bags.

Good Humor, which received only $350,000 in measured media (excluding newspapers) added several new products, including King Cone ice cream cone, Jumbo Jet Star water ice stick, Sunkist orange juice bar and Finger Bar water ice stick.

*AA estimate

Union Carbide Corp., Danbury, Conn., the 69th largest national advertiser, reduced domestic advertising spending by 7% in 1982 to $83.7 million from $90 million in 1981. Sales in the company's industrial products registered considerable decreases, and even the consumer group, which in previous years had recorded large increases, was flat. However, products such as Eveready batteries, Glad line of plastic bags and wrap and Prestone automotive products contributed an increasing share of the company's profits.

Worldwide sales dropped 10.9% to $9.06 billion, while earnings registered an even sharper drop. Union Carbide earned $310 million in 1982, only 52% of its 1981 earnings of $649 million.

Sales by geographic segments also underwent some changes. U.S. contribution to total earnings declined from 69% to 67%. Europe, which contributed 10% of total sales, experienced a 7% drop in sales, though its operating profits increased by 16%. Sales in Latin America—8% of the total—showed no increase in 1982, but operating profits declined by 8%. One area that did show some increase was the Far East. Sales increased 1% over 1981, while operating profits increased by 3%. Canada, suffering from its worst recession in 50 years, experienced the most severe sales and operating profit declines among Union Carbide's international segments. Sales declined by 18% there, while the operating loss amounted to $22 million, contrasted with a $41 million profit in 1981.

Union Carbide's activities are divided into five major areas: Chemicals and plastics, gases and related products, metals and carbons, batteries/home and automotive products, and specialty products.

In 1982, chemicals and plastics sales declined 13% from the previous year. Prices for most products weakened in reaction to flagging demand. The company noted that average selling prices were down 2% in 1982, and operating profit of the segment declined by 72%.

It wasn't encouraging for gases and related products or metals and carbons either. Both segments registered declines in sales and operating profits.

The brightest performance came from Union Carbide's consumer-related home sales. Sales increased by 1% in 1982 over the 1981 level. Average domestic prices were 4% below those in 1981, while volume increased by 7%. The company notes that antifreeze business volumes were especially strong, climbing by 6% over 1981.

In 1982, Union Carbide spent $52.4 million in measured media, down 6.7% from the previous year. The lion's share of this went to network tv, which received $40.9 million or nearly 78%. However, network tv spending was down 3.5% from 1981. Spot tv, pegged at $4.0 million in 1982, was up nearly 18% over 1981, though still short of the 1980 level, $4.2 million. Spot radio expenditures were down by nearly 34%.

In other spending, ad expenditures in print dropped from its total share of 7% in 1981 to 6.7% in 1982, while outdoor advertising expenditures dropped from $491,000 in 1981 to $14,300 in 1982.

The largest portion of Union Carbide's budget was spent in promoting Eveready batteries. In fact, more than a third, or $21.2 million, of the company's measured media spending went to support the batteries, and, of that total, $19.5 million went to network tv. Glad products also received considerable ad support—$17.3 million in measured media. Once again most of it was placed in network tv.

Glad advertising continued to feature Tom Bosley as the spokesman for all Glad products, including the new Glad Deodorant Large Kitchen Garbage bags introduced in early 1982.

In addition, with the introduction of a line of products under the Glad Sheer Strength brand name, Union Carbide implemented a major new strategy to market its plastic bags. The Sheer Strength trash bags and large kitchen bag liners are made with the Union Carbide-patented linear low density polyethylene. This material, according to the company, allows the use of lower gauge film and still retain the puncture and stretch performance required by customers. The line of Sheer Strength products are priced to compete directly with private label brands.

During the year, Union Carbide continued to use Sunday inserts, direct mail and on-pack coupons to stimulate consumer awareness and purchase of its Glad line of products.

Measured media spending for the company's Prestone automotive products was up from $5.2 million in 1981 to $6.1 million, again most of it on network tv.

Prestone, which continues to be the No. 1 brand among antifreezes, continued to launch its in-season advertising campaign with the start of fall sports programing. A heavy schedule of Prestone commercials was aired during the Major League Baseball playoffs and World Series, as well as Sunday and Monday night network football telecasts.

Consumer promotion support for Prestone consisted of cash refunds, including a $2 cash refund offered during the peak selling season. Prestone Super Flush and the new Prestone Super Sealer products were also promoted with consumer refund offers.

Simoniz products received $639,300 in measured media spending, slightly below the amount allocated to it the year before. Simoniz products were advertised during tv sports programs and in magazines. In addition, a racing sponsorship program, including a Simoniz car in the Indianapolis 500, provided increased visibility and consumer recognition of the entire Simoniz brand. Consumer promotions consisted of cash refunds during the full year.

In mid-1983, Union Carbide announced the formation of a new group to help market its advanced technology and related services to the chemicals, plastics, oil and gas-processing industries. The group is being called the enginering and technology services group and comprises the company's newly formed engineering and technology services divisions, catalysts and process systems division and Unipol systems department.

Among other noteworthy events, Union Carbide joined three other companies—General Motors Corp., Aluminum Co. of America and Minnesota Mining and Mfg. Co.—to file suit in federal court in 1983 to block the Federal Trade Commission from continuing to release financial reports that the companies termed confidential.

The company, along with the others, claims that the FTC is violating laws and its own previous rules in giving certain outside consultants access to confidential corporate data. The FTC routinely hires consultants under its Line of Business Report Program to compile data on product sales, costs and profits supplied by 450 corporations. However, the Line of Business Report Program has been suspended since 1981 because the FTC is evaluating whether it can be justified on a cost-benefit basis.

U.S. Government

	1982	1981
Sales........	—	—
Earnings.....	—	—
Advertising*..	$205,453,100	$189,026,000

For the second consecutive year, growth in total U.S. government ad spending was held to single digit levels, an 8.7% rise to $205.5 million in 1982. While the U.S. government advertising presence is smaller than that of governments in several other Western nations, the federal ad spending total was still large enough to make the government the 29th largest advertiser in the nation.

Early in the Reagan administration, Reaganites made government promotional spending a whipping boy, and they have succeeded in curbing the dollar flow going into some minor public service advertising efforts. Key Office of Management & Budget officials who led that cost-cutting purge have moved on to new assignments, or out of the government, since then. And the Reagan team is selectively backing new public service ad ventures it finds philosophically agreeable—a million dollar Department of Transportation seat belt ad campaign, for example, in preference to mandatory airbag or "passive" restraint regulations.

The continuing upward push on governmentwide ad spending is not amenable to easy control, however, because of the military's continuing need to "sell" the volunteer armed services to young adults and their parents. Other major influences on government ad spending are the decisions made by marketing managers at the Postal Service, which is spending big to maintain its place in the hotly competitive, premium-price, next-day delivery service, and at Amtrak, which is trying to hold its own against cut-rate competition from short-haul airlines.

Further enlarging the government's ad outlay this year are decisions to have the Treasury Department's Bureau of the Mint sell gold and silver coins to the public. Gold investors previously bought and traded foreign gold pieces, such as South Africa's Kruggerrand, because the U.S. had no similar product in the market.

More significantly for ad spending levels, Congress has directed the Mint to aggressively market Olympic commemorative coins as a fund raiser for the 1984 games in Los Angeles.

Military recruiters enjoyed particularly good "sales" in 1982 as the poor economy drove more high school graduates, the prime target for the armed services, to the recruiting office. Record percentages of high school grads signed up, but some military marketing men are already wondering how long their success can last if the economy continues to turn around this year and youth unemployment takes a dip.

With enlistments up, growth in armed services ad budgets moderated to 5.6% in fiscal year 1982, for a total of $155.5 million. Another modest 5% increase is expected again in 1983. By comparison, the 1981 total was 15.8% larger than 1980.

The military ad budget line up (1982/1983) looks like this:

- The Army (N W Ayer ABH, New York), with the largest manpower needs, $81.6 million/$83.9 million, divided among the active Army, $60.8 million/$61.7 million, the Army Reserve, $14.5 million/$15.8 million, and the Army Reserve Officers Training Corps, $6.4 million/$6.4 million.
- Navy (Ted Bates Advertising/New York) $17.2 million/$16.5 million, but hoping for an increase next year.
- Marine Corps (J. Walter Thompson USA, Washington), $13.8 million/$16 million.
- Air Force (D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, New York) $14.5 million/$15.3 million.
- Army National Guard, $5 million/$6.4 million and Air National Guard, $2.2 million/$2.3 million (both Needham, Harper & Steers, Washington).
- The Coast Guard, a Transportation Department unit in peacetime, $650,000/$975,000.

While the lion's share of Pentagon money is spent selling individual armed services, the Defense Department has been aggressively experimenting with a multiservice advertising approach. From a "test" program a few years ago, joint service ad spending, through Grey Advertising, New York, climbed to $18.2 million last year and $19.9 million this year. This fall, the Pentagon plans to field a major test that could help set the pattern of its future ad spending by gauging the relative effectiveness of various levels of joint vs. singleservice advertising in test cells around the country.

For 1984, all the military services are requesting only token budget increases from Congress.

U.S. Postal Service ad spending (Young & Rubicam, New York) has accelerated sharply in recent years, primarily because USPS refuses to concede volume to its horde of competitors in the premium overnight delivery service.

USPS ad spending jumped 33% last year to $20.2 million, and is heading much higher this year, perhaps to $28 million or more. While USPS won't disclose ad spending in support of its overnight Express Mail service, available estimates of measured media spending put the figure in excess of $11 million last year. Express Mail volume was 28.5 million pieces last year, producing $339.2 million in revenue, compared with 23.8 million pieces producing $269.7 million in revenue in 1981.

Other Postal Service mail products getting ad support include Priority Mail service, the new Electronic Computer Originated Mail (ECOM) service and Intelpost international mail. Significant amounts are spent in support of stamp sales to collectors, a business USPS has turned into well over $100 million in sales per year.

The recession continued to plague Amtrak last year: For the second consecutive year ridership slipped, reaching 19 million boardings in fiscal 1982, off 7.6% from 1981. Amtrak's peak, in the oil embargo year 1979, was 21.4 million. Volume improved this spring as the economy picked up, Amtrak said. Revenue figures for 1982 were not available.

Amtrak trimmed ad spending 5% during the year to $16.5 million, but the 1983 advertising expenditure is expected to rebound to $18 million or more. With new equipment running on its rails, Amtrak dropped its long running "America's Getting Into Training" theme in favor of "All Aboard Amtrak," with ads that link the railroad to the high-tech service provided by airlines.

Including the Bureau of the Mint campaigns, a series of other, smaller government ad campaigns added another $13 million to the ad spending total. Ad programs ranged from a $12,000 campaign to warn dairy farmers about the danger of brucellosis—a disease afflicting cattle—to $1.2 million budget from the government-funded Corporation for Public Broadcasting to finance tune-in advertising for Public Broadcasting System shows.

Not all government ad programs are directly funded by the taxpayers, however. The Postal Service receives only small government subsidies earmarked to keep rates down for particular classes of mail. Amtrak has revenues from ticket sales. The Mint has revenue from the sales of the coins. Other "quasi-government" units have revenue from the sale of government-backed insurance, for example.

STRAIGHT TALK ABOUT COMPUTER TECHNOLOGY AT MARITZ MARKET RESEARCH

The people of Maritz Market Research take a very basic approach toward computer technology. We believe technology should meet the needs of research – not the reverse.

CRT interviewing in MMR Survey Centers helps clients learn more in less time. Computers make it possible to access data at any time using only a phone and a terminal. And computer technology isn't limited to large survey centers. Microprocessors literally take CRT interviewing to the respondent, in malls and in central locations.

All this means computer technology at Maritz Market Research is designed to make market research more flexible, more accurate, and more valuable.

Leading the list of other government advertisers is the Federal Crop Insurance Corp., which spent $4.8 million for advertising in fiscal year 1982 through Burson-Marsteller, Chicago.

While some agencies and departments were able to wrangle more ad dollars in 1982, most saw a cut in the amounts of funds they were able to use for promotion. PBS' allocation from the Corporation for Public Broadcasting was trimmed from $3.5 million to $1.2 million because of lowered federal aid from Congress for public tv. The Internal Revenue Service ad budget was slashed in half, to $262,000. Its in-house-produced campaign informs taxpayers about tax tips.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, part of the Transportation Department, reported no ad spending in 1982 after years of public service ad work. But it is working with Grey Advertising under a $500,000 contract for an automobile seat belt campaign and has a $249,000 contract with Metaphor, Los Angeles, to produce an anti-drunk-driving campaign.

Another multiyear government ad contract involves a three-year $1.2 million pact between the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute and Action/Porter Novelli, Washington, for educational commercials on high blood pressure.

In its first year as a government advertiser, the Overseas Private Investment Corp., which writes government-backed political risk insurance to encourage U.S. investment in developing countries, spent $800,000 during fiscal year 1982 through Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York.

The Export-Import Bank, another government affiliated agency that provides financing and insurance for U.S. exporters, is considering a sizable ad campaign to promote its services to business.

Despite other budget reductions, the Advertising Council maintained its level of activity in the past year. The Ad Council's government clients spent just over $1.3 million for seven campaigns, including the Smokey the Bear fire prevention campaign (Foote, Cone & Belding), U.S. Savings Bonds (Leo Burnett Co.), the Treasury Department's direct deposit campaign (McCann-Erickson) encouraging electronic deposit of Social Security and other government checks. New Advertising Council campaigns in development include a health promotion/disease prevention campaign for the Health & Human Services Department (Kenyon & Eckhardt) and a drug awareness campaign, also for HHS, through Needham, Harper & Steers. Budgets for each are expected to run about $200,000.

There are seldom changes among ad agencies handling major government accounts, although government contracting rules require the business to be put out to bid on a regular basis, usually every three years. In completed bidding reviews this year, the Pentagon's joint service advertising programs awarded incumbent Grey Advertising a new three-year contract. But the Coast Guard dropped Uniworld after one contract year. A successor is to be named before this summer is over.

Two other major ad assignments under review this summer were the Postal Service (Y&R incumbent) and the Army National Guard and Air National Guard (NH&S/Washington, incumbent).

AA estimate, VW of America

Volkswagen of America, Troy, Mich., a subsidiary of Volkswagenwerk AG, Wolfsburg, West Germany, increased its advertising spending in 1982 by 21% to roughly $98 million, making it the 61st largest national advertiser.

The company struggled to reposition its line with campaigns promoting its German heritage, high technological standards, and sportscar performance. Market share continued to decline through mid-1983, although sales figures for May and June reflected an upturn the company hoped would begin a long-term trend.

The parent company's sales dropped to $15.2 billion from $15.4 billion, with a net loss of $122 million for the year. Volkswagen of America contributed to the parent's woes by registering a loss of $142 million for 1982. Parent company chairman Carl Hahn recently told stockholders, however, that the subsidiary turned a slight profit for the first six months of 1983.

Sales dropped 40% for the year; VW delivered 218,879 cars to buyers. Domestically produced Rabbits suffered the sharpest sales drop, down to 91,166 from 162,445 the year before. Sales of imported Audis slipped a bit to 45,954, and imported VWs—including the Jetta, Scirocco and Quantum—were down to 67,352 from 82,173. Only the imported Porsche line registered an increase, to 14,407 from 11,241.

According to the annual report, the company's over-all weakness in 1982 stemmed from the continuing world recession and the slack demand the recession created in North American markets. The parent company claims in the report that in 1982, "our subsidiary company was for the first time seriously affected" by "the decline in volume of vehicle sales on the American automotive market."

To correct its marketing problems, the company continued to turn away from its image as a maker of domestic economy cars, preferring to portray itself as a maker of foreign performance cars. The heaviest ad dollars went to Rabbit, which remains the most important model in the company's U.S. plans. Quantum, VW's flagship model, received increased ad support vis-a-vis the other models as the year went on and will receive even more in 1983.

Two new Rabbit models, the GTI and the Wolfsburg Edition, became available in 1982 and 1983. GTI, advertised as "a wolf in sheep's clothing," features an array of high-performance sports equipment. The Wolfsburg sedan includes a discounted package of amenities, including power steering and wider wheels. A Wolfsburg convertible is also available.

All Rabbit models also received some general upgrading, according to company spokesman Ted Kade.

Also, a five-cylinder version of Quantum became available in the U.S. early in 1983, completing that model's introduction into the American market. The Dasher disappeared from the U.S. market in the 1982 model year.

VW also got a new president in 1982, when Noel Phillips replaced James McLernon. Mr. Phillips was serving as managing director of a South African auto distributor at the time of his appointment. He had been Volkswagen of America's executive vp for sales and marketing from 1978 to 1980.

Said James Fuller, vp of the VW division: "We have to be consistent in our strategy, and we think it will take a minimum of three years to accomplish our awareness goals."

There has been some change, though: Lately, VW ads have focused on value and sportiness, replacing the strict emphasis on technology that characterized most of 1982's ads. A two-page spread in Newsweek, for instance, featured a black-&-white page with a photo of the Rabbit in a stark, sleek setting and the headline, "It's a marvel of German engineering." The facing page featured a counter-headline, "Who cares?", illustrating a four-color photo of a young couple tooling through the countryside in a Rabbit convertible with the top down.

A July Time ad reflected what Robert Rees of Doyle Dane Bernbach said will be "a lot more stress on value and durability" in the future. The ad played up Rabbit's affordability in a bold headline, mentioning in smaller print that VW cars are "German designed, German engineered". The tag line, "Nothing else is a Volkswagen," remains in use, as it has for almost two years.

VW has sold its Sterling Heights, Mich., plant to Chrysler. The plant, a converted missile factory, was never actually used to make Volkswagens. The remaining U.S. plant, at Westmoreland, Pa., laid off more than 1,500 employes, closed for two weeks, and reopened with one shift of workers producing 470 Rabbits per day, down from two shifts and 650 Rabbits.

It is rumored that VW and Chrysler soon will announce a joint production venture at the Westmoreland plant. Spokesman Kade's only comment: "We are not going to be selling the plant and it is not going to be taken over by Chrysler. We have been in discussion with Chrysler on a wide range of business opportunities." Chairman Carl Hahn recently said: "We are convinced that it is the right thing to be represented by our own production plant in the USA in order to be prepared for all eventualities."

The sale of the Sterling Heights plant contributed to VW's decision to abandon its longtime goal of a 5% U.S. market share. "We were talking about 5% of a healthy market, with sales around 500,000 and two U.S. plants in operation," said Mr. Kade. "Selling the second plant changes the whole picture." While obviously unhappy with its 2.4% market share in 1982, VW has not set a new target figure.

The introduction of the Porsche 944 and the Audi 5000S were the chief developments in the Porsche-Audi line for 1982 and early 1983. The 944, positioned as an affordable performance car, has been selling very well, leading P-A marketing manager Richard Weidman to predict total 1983 sales of 20,000 for the Porsche line. Also contributing to the line's continuing growth are the recently introduced 911 Cabriolet, a convertible, and the 928S, a revamped 928 featuring a much more powerful engine. Porsche relied almost exclusively on national print advertising, and plans to do so for the foreseeable future.

The Audi 5000S, a 1984 model introduced in June, "is positioned as a German luxury, high-tech, advanced tech automobile," said Mr. Weidman. Priced at $15,800, the 5000S is pictured by the company as competition for Mercedes, Saab, Volvo and other luxury cars in the $10,000 to $12,000 market and up.

A six-week tv campaign and a 90-day national print effort introduced the 5000S to U.S. markets. The ads focus on engineering, aerodynamics and the model's selection by auto journalists as Europe's "Car of the Year."

Finally, if you decide to get involved in sweepstakes and games, the most visible tip of the promotional iceberg (in five years, sweeps have almost tripled in number), our more than 21 years of experience can be invaluable. We'll help you conceptualize, administer and—through our National Judging Institute—judge your promotion. We go out of our way to help our clients avoid the myriad pitfalls that can befall the unwary promoter.

A 5000 wagon and a turbo gas 5000 (supplanting a diesel now being withdrawn from the market) will also be on the market. Porsche's major introduction will be a 200-horsepower edition of the 911, called the Carrera.

VW moved its sales and marketing staff from Englewood Cliffs, N.J., to Troy, Mich., early in 1983, consolidating its administrative operations in the Detroit area. Doyle Dane Bernbach, the New York-based agency which has long handled VW, opened a Detroit office in March, largely to service VW. Robert Rees, who had been executive vp on the account in New York, is president of the new office.

According to Leading National Advertisers, VW spent just under $20 million to advertise the Rabbit line in 1982. LNA totals for other models: Audi, $11.4 million; Jetta, $4.5 million; Scirocco, $4.2 million; Porsche, $8 million; Vanagon, $2.7 million. VW spent $9.3 million to introduce the Quantum; that model will receive even greater support in 1983.

Hiram Walker Resources Ltd., Toronto, the 98th largest national advertiser, raised advertising expenditures 5% to $44.4 million, compared with $42.3 million in 1981. The company, which has holdings in distilled spirits, wines, cordials and energy production, increased revenues 12% to $2.76 billion. But because of declining distilled spirits sales, downward trends in oil and gas prices and the shutdown of an overseas drilling operation, the holding company's net income plunged 62% from 1981 levels, to $80.3 million.

Of its three operating segments, the natural resources division gave Hiram Walker Resources the most trouble during 1982. For the second straight year, revenues in this division were up but income was down 50% to $33.8 million. The company drilled 20% fewer oil and natural gas wells during 1982, and production of crude oil and natural gas liquids was about equal to 1981.

In 1982, Home Oil sold $224 million worth of properties, cutting net income by $143.6 million. The move was considered necessary to help consolidate the lagging business.

Keeping the faith

In the recessionary economy of recent years, more than one believer in advertising has encouraged marketers to increase ad spending instead of cutting back. The companies that follow certainly held firm. They even increased their ad budgets in 1982 despite suffering from sales levels that were lower in 1982 than in 1981.

- Dart & Kraft

Shaken faith

But for every action, there's a reaction: There were those companies that cut their ad spending even though they managed to register sales gains in 1982. They were as follows:

- Brown-Forman Distillers
- Chesebrough-Ponds
- Chrysler Corp.
- Clorox Co.
- Du Pont
- Esmark Inc.
- Nabisco Brands
- RCA Corp.
- Richardson-Vicks
- Time Inc.
- UAL Inc.

What goes up . . .

As the year 1982 opened, a number of companies among the 100 Leaders, several of them selling leisure and entertainment products, geared up for some heavy ad spending. The following companies recorded ad spending increases of more than 50% in 1982, compared with their 1981 levels:

• Stroh Brewery Co.	243.2%
• Pan American	105.7
• Mattel Inc.	97.0
• IBM Corp.	84.3
• Mazda Motors	73.6
• Campbell Soup Co.	70.9
• R.J. Reynolds	65.0
• 20th Century-Fox	54.8
• Mars Inc.	53.1

In the case of Stroh and Reynolds, of course, a great part of the increase came through mergers with Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. and Heublein Inc., respectively.

. . . can come down

On the other side of the ledger, there are those companies who retrenched, taking a scythe to their ad budgets. The following companies cut their ad spending by more than 10% in 1982 from 1981 levels:

• Loew's Corp.	−27.0%
• RCA Corp.	−23.3
• Richardson-Vicks	−13.2
• American Brands	−12.0
• General Foods	−11.8
• Du Pont	−11.5
• Chrysler Corp.	−10.4
• UAL Inc.	−10.3

ment wells—the company holds a 25% interest in the major discovery of a well in Wyoming.

The company's gas utility operations, headed by Consumers' Gas Co. Ltd., a Canadian operation, showed a 26% increase in revenues, from $911.9 million in 1981 to $1,154 million in 1982. Earnings rose even more subtantially—65%—as it increased to $147.8 million from $89.5 million.

Hiram Walker's distilled spirits operations had a relatively flat year as revenues in 1982 totaled $1.165 billion, down slightly from $1.196 billion the previous year. Earnings increased 1.6% to $223 million.

Along with others in its category, Canadian Club has been forced to fight a continuing battle against the drop in whisky consumption. While CC dropped from seventh to ninth in the sales rankings of top liquor brands sold in 1982, the largest share of Walker's measured media spending for distilled spirits continues to go to Canadian Club with $12.4 million, up 9.5% from 1981.

"Our sales were down about 5% during 1982," says Steven Nadelberg, the company's senior vp-marketing director. "Not that it's good to lose sales, but we've had some of the smallest losses of any whisky. In other words, everybody's losing right now."

In 1982, CC departed from its usual "find the case" promotions to an advertising campaign using the theme, "The best in the house."

The treasure chest campaigns, however, may not be gone for long. CC recently completed its latest sweepstakes, a $100,000 in Canadian gold giveaway, started in March, 1983. Mr. Nadelberg says the results from the $2 million campaign were pleasing. The sweepstakes' 6 million entries were the biggest response to a distilled spirits sweepstakes, he claims.

The brand got an unsolicited boost from country singer Merle Haggard, who wrote a song about his favorite brand. Mr. Haggard also made the "Guinness Book of World Records" in 1982, buying the world's biggest round of drinks—5,100 shots of Canadian Club at a cost of $12,000 at Billy Bob's, a famous honky tonk in Ft Worth, Tex.

Although there is an apparent market trend toward buying less expensive whiskies—in response Seagram's V.O. is dropping its proof from the traditional 86 to 80 proof—Hiram Walker has decided to keep CC a premium brand.

"We feel that if you drop the proof, you drop the the quality," says Mr. Nadelberg. "Although there is a limited trend toward buying lower quality whisky, we feel that it would do a lot more harm than good to reduce the proof. From our vantage, Seagram's move creates less competition for us, because we're going to remain a premium product."

CC is running more advertising, particularly in outdoor, directed at black consumers, as well as Hispanics.

Walker's Ten High bourbon whisky ranks No. 23 in 1982 sales of top liquor brands selling 1.76 million 9-liter cases—a drop from No. 22 in 1981 with 1.95 million cases sold. Ad spending increased to $476,300 in 1982, from $205,800 in 1981.

Hiram Walker moderately increased support to Lauders Scotch whisky by 5.7% to $681,000.

Walker's brandy ranked No. 22 in sales of top liquor brands selling 1.76 million 9-liter cases, up from No. 25 with 1.703 million cases in 1981.

Media spending for Booth's High & Dry gin dropped 27% to $558,100 in 1982. Within the company's growing line of cordials were the year's star performers, as they capitalized on the increase of consumer interest and awareness of cordials and fine liqueurs.

While Walker increased media support for cordials by 16% to $2.7 million in 1982, it was far below the 44% jump of 1981.

Continuing its leadership of America's cordial line—it has 35 brands—the company added Sambucca—an anise flavored cordial—and Cranberry Cordial.

Walker supported the Cranberry Cordial with four-color ads in People, Cosmopolitan and other magazines.

In the liqueur category, Walker's Kahlua continued to be the largest selling brand in Canada and the U.S. The coffee-flavored liqueur ranked No. 27 in sales of top liquor brands with more than a million 9-liter cases sold. Kahlua was up 3.2% over 1981, to 1.6 million cases sold. The coffee-flavored liqueur had an ad budget of $4.7 million in 1982, a 33% jump in spending compared with 1981, which in turn was 37% higher than in 1980. Most of the spending went to magazines—including Bon Appetit and Southern Living—and were directed at a young, affluent audience.

For other liqueurs (all products of W.A. Taylor & Co., Miami, a wholly owned subsidiary of Walker): Drambuie received about $2.3 million in ad support, up 10%, with most of it in magazines; Venetian Cream, which trails Bailey's for the second consecutive year, had its media budget slashed 96% to $41,400; Peter Heering was down 31% to $99,500; Praline, introduced in 1981, dropped 30% to $1 million in 1982, and Tia Maria received $2.3 million in outdoor and magazine advertising, down 12% from 1981.

Courvoisier cognac, another brand in the Taylor Co. line, increased spending 46% to $3.3 million in 1982.

Makers Mark bourbon, a $750,000 account handled by Doe-Anderson Advertising, Louisville, and marketed in Indiana, Kentucky and Tennessee, by Taylor, expects to go to national distribution in 1983.

Walker's Maidstone Wine & Spirits Co., a Los Angeles-based importer, stepped up its outdoor campaign in 1982 with 30-sheet outdoor boards. Roy Stevens, president of Maidstone, said advertising aimed at blacks will appear either in late 1983 or early 1984. The company is already testing the Hispanic marketplace, stepping up Hispanic-oriented advertising by 5% during 1982, with plans to increase that amount in 1983.

Another division, Fredrick Wildman & Sons, New York, handles premium wines. Its only advertised brand is Moreau Blanc, a dry French white wine in the medium-high price range. Many of the Wildman wines are in the $30-to-$40 a bottle category in restaurants, and $20 in stores. Much of Wildman's advertising is in trade magazines—up 52% to $124,600 in 1982—although it plans to start an awareness campaign soon in Fortune.

Warner Communications, New York, the 25th largest national advertiser, increased its advertising last year by a hefty 46% from 1981 levels, to an estimated $232.2 million.

The major reason for the boost in ad spending is the same five-letter word that is causing most of the problems plaguing the entertainment and communications conglomerate: Atari. The disclosure last Dec. 8 that sales of the division's videogames had collapsed sent corporate fortunes reeling.

The news meant that while Warner still managed to achieve a 23% gain in sales last year, almost $4 billion, earnings rose just 14%, to $257.8 million. During the days they couldn't meet the surging demand for Atari's products, Warner execs had confidently predicted 1982 earnings would top those of 1981 by 40% to 50%.

And the bad tidings have continued into 1983. Atari lost $45.6 million in the first quarter on a sales decline of 21.8%, forcing Warner into the red to the tune of $18.9 million. Atari lost an additional $310.5 million in the second quarter on a sales decline of 48.6%, again turning over-all corporate profits to losses.

As if all this weren't enough, other Warner holdings have not exactly turned in stellar performances. Its film division has produced no mega-hits on the order of "Return of the Jedi" or "Trading Places." In recorded music, rival CBS has toppled Warner from the No. 1 spot in domestic sales, in part, ironically, because of the success of CBS performers like Michael Jackson and Men at Work on MTV:Music Television (a cable tv service also owned by Warner). The cable division in general is growing, but losses keep mounting. Warner's efforts to battle the supremacy of Home Box Office by setting up a joint venture of its Movie Channel with rival Showtime have been stymied.

Warner is handling these reversals in much the same way the nation's auto makers have tried to cope with their serious sales skids: Make major changes in product and procedures, step up marketing efforts and back it all with generous spending hikes. For instance, Atari spent $14.5 million in the first quarter of 1983 for tv advertising of its videogames, almost double what it spent in the year-ago quarter.

Attempts to restore Atari's prominence in the electronics field have included hiring Alan Alda as a corporate spokesman, at a cost reportedly in excess of $10 million, and replacing chairman Raymond Kassar with James J. Morgan, a marketing whiz from Philip Morris. The division also is thoroughly revamping its computer and videogame offerings.

There have been some bright spots amidst the gloom, such as the comeback of Atari's coin-operated (arcade) games division. Atari has reached agreements with other heavy hitters in videogames and entertainment—Nolan Bushnell, Lucasfilms Ltd., MCA Video Games—that will enable it to share in their expertise, as well as obtain rights to market cartridges that tie-in with popular characters from Children's Computer Workshop ("Sesame Street"), Henson Associates (the Muppets) and Walt Disney.

Warner's measured media ad spending for Atari during 1982 was $74 million, far above the $27.9 million spent in 1981. Most of that was spent in network and spot tv. Atari's operating revenues rose 63.7%, to $2 billion, while operating income, pinched by Atari's poor showing, rose only 12.8%, to $323.3 million.

The division's $11 million computer assignment moved to Wells, Rich, Greene from Young & Rubicam. AtariTel, a telecommunications product to be introduced next year, was assigned to Backer & Spielvogel.

Warner's filmed entertainment division—movies, tv production and home video—has high hopes for 1983. Marketing muscle will be put behind major fall and Christmas film releases scheduled by Warner Bros. and affiliates, including Burt Reynolds' "Cannonball II;" "Never Say Never Again," Sean Connery's return as James Bond, and "The Right Stuff," based on Tom Wolfe's bestseller about the astronauts. "Superman III" and "Twilight Zone" paced Warner Bros.' summer offerings, though another, "The Man with Two Brains," was one of the summer's certified flops. A trio of titles—"High Road to China," "Local Hero" and "The Outsiders"—did well in the first part of the year.

Warner Bros. Television has five programs, six hours, on tap for the fall, twice what it sold at the start of the

Down on the farm

Though each of the 100 Leaders spend only a minuscule amount, if at all, on farm publication advertising, there are several that do pay attention to this medium. They are:

• Du Pont	7.6%
• Pfizer Inc.	3.8
• Union Carbide Corp.	3.1

Medium crazy

Then there were those that like network tv: Three companies among the 100 Leaders put more than 80% of their measured media advertising into network tv, the highest proportion of ad budgets placed in any medium. They were:

• Beecham Group Ltd.	82.9%
• Polaroid Corp.	82.2
• SmithKline Beckman	80.0

It's an item in the budget

Heavy spending in the Charlie Chaplin campaign notwithstanding, International Business Machines Corp. had the lowest ad to sales ratio, 0.2%, among the 100 Leaders. Considering that the company had more than $34 billion in sales in 1982, that's not too surprising.

Noxell Corp.

One heavy investor

Among the 100 Leaders, Noxell Corp. had the highest ad-to-sales ratio, a whopping 18.9%. Of course, it helped that Noxell was also the smallest of the 100 in terms of revenues. The company, one might say, tried to clean up on the market with a wad of investment in advertising.

1982-1983 season. Two newcomers, "Scarecrew and Mrs. King" and "The Yellow Rose," are being talked up as potential hits. Two programs, "Goodnight, Beantown" and "The Mississippi," survived midseason tryouts that felled four other pilots. In miniseries, "The Mystic Warrior" will follow the Warner blockbusters of the 1982-1983 season, "The Thorn Birds" and "V."

Warner Home Video turned to special promotional programs, particularly a "Spring Fever" pitch that offered 22 titles for $39.98. New titles were being sold at that price as well, a step that helped land "Best Friends" on the videocassette best-seller lists.

For 1982, the filmed entertainment division spent $26.3 million in measured media, most of it in network tv. That was off 12.3% from 1981. While revenues fell 8.1%, to $694.1 million, operating income soared 312.1%, to $101.8 million. Results were paced by hit films, including "Chariots of Fire," "Firefox" and "The Road Warrior," gains in tv programing and distribution and improved results from Warner Home Video.

The music emanating this year from Warner's recorded music and music publishing division has been none too sweet. The much-discussed recovery in the record business seems to have eluded Warner's artists, who have had difficulty in regaining their traditional top spots on Billboard's Hot 100 lists. Prince and the Greg Kihn Band have been just about the company's only acts to crack the top 10 in singles and albums. As a result, CBS pushed ahead with 23% of the U.S. market, dropping Warner to No. 2 with 21%.

In cable communications, the company is scrambling to implement solutions to a variety of problems. This division consists of two operations, Warner Amex Cable Communications and Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Co., both jointly owned with American Express Co. Rumors persist the latter is growing increasingly tired of underwriting its share of the large losses the division keeps incurring, but both companies have steadfastly insisted no changes in their relationship are planned.

Last month, the Dallas Cable Television Board warned Warner Amex about the quality of its service to its 53,971 subscribers in that market, or face fines of up to $200 per day. The company attributes the large number of requests for service, and delays in answering such requests, largely to a shortage of manpower, and said that steps are being taken to remedy the situation.

And other changes have been made: Warner has elected to carry commercials on Nickelodeon, the children's cable channel; it is requiring cable operators carrying MTV to pay for the innovative music video channel; staffing has undergone deep cuts as former U.S. transportation secretary Drew Lewis has taken over as chairman and chief executive officer. The company also recently appointed John C. Charlton senior vp-programing, marketing and sales at Warner Amex Cable Communications.

And while the proposed joint venture of the Movie Channel and Showtime was blocked by the Justice Department, other alternatives are being explored.

On the marketing side, Warner Amex launched what it called the QUBE Network, linking its interactive cable systems in six cities, and began advertising MTV on network tv.

Despite the division's difficulties, it keeps growing, with subscribers totaling 1.2 million by first quarter 1983 vs. 860,000 in 1982. Franchises were granted for Milwaukee and parts of New York, and systems were acquired in portions of Houston.

Measured media ad spending for the cable division came to almost $4 million in 1982, mostly in spot tv and magazines. Consolidated revenues rose 74%, to $307.6 million, with net losses totaling $46.6 million; half of that net loss was accrued to Warner under the Warner Amex 50-50 ownership arrangement.

Warner's consumer products division has three segments: Franklin Mint, Warner Publishing and Warner Cosmetics. Franklin Mint in early 1983 suffered declines in revenues and an operating loss during what Warner called "the seasonally weak first quarter," but order backlog rose 4.3% compared with yearend 1982, to $420 million.

Franklin Mint spent $20.2 million in measured media in 1982, up 5.3% from 1981. The lion's share of that spending came in magazines and newspaper supplements, with some testing of tv. Revenues rose 10% to $445.9 million, but operating income fell to $26.2 million, down 18.3% from the amount achieved from the date of Warner's acquisition of Franklin Mint in March, 1981.

In publishing, Warner Books got off to a good start in 1983, thanks to "Megatrends" and "Ascent into Hell" in hardcover; "Thy Neighbor's Wife" in paperback, and "Life Extension" in trade paperback. DC Comics introduced an adventure series, "Ronin," that made the best debut of any of its comic books. Warner Publisher Services was signed as distributor of a number of new and existing magazines, including The Movies. A new Warner Software division of Warner Publishing was established to meet the growing market for computer products. Its first venture is a magazine, Microkids, for 10-to-16-year-old computer buffs, jointly produced with New York's Cloverdale Press.

The company's hit book titles in 1982 included "Never Say Diet Cookbook" and "Life Extension" in hardcover and "The Cardinal Sins," "Chances" and "A Few Minutes with Andy Rooney" in paperback. Among magazine titles added by Warner Publisher Services last year were American Health, Rolling Stone and Conde Nast titles.

Warner Cosmetics has been a very bright spot in its parent company's otherwise gloomy situation. The Vanderbilt fragrance, introduced last year, has been its industry's fastest growing women's product. Polo men's fragrance has moved into first place in its category at many department stores, while its companion product, Lauren for women, climbed to No. 3 in many markets.

Sales of the Chaps brand for men have resumed the growth enjoyed during the western-wear fad of 1981-82. A skincare line bearing the Lauren name was launched during the first quarter. And plans are being readied for the debut next year of a fragrance line, priced above Lauren, created by designer Paloma Picasso.

Measured media ad spending last year for Warner Cosmetics totaled $6.1 million, up 43.2%. Most of it appeared in spot tv and magazines.

In other corporate enterprises, WCI Sports, which owns the Cosmos soccer team, acquired a 48% interest in the Pittsburgh Pirates last April. The Cosmos are unprofitable, but the company likes "the value of its international recognition." The Pirates games are being used as programing for the company's cable franchise in Pittsburgh.

Warner Theatre Productions not only backs theatrical ventures, but develops material for other media owned by the company and by others. Current properties include "Crimes of the Heart," "Pump Boys and Dinettes" and "Woman of the Year."

Warner last year decided to shed one of its operations, Knickerbocker Toy Co., which was severely hit by the decline in traditional toy products. The result was a $35 million pretax loss, taken in the fourth quarter. Some lines were sold to Hasbro Toy Co., in exchange for Warner acquiring 39% of the stock of that company. Ad spending for Knickerbocker in measured media last year totaled $5.9 million.

That coveted No. 100 spot—"Look ma, I made the list"—has been shared by four companies in the past five years. American Broadcasting Cos., the nation's No. 1 media company in revenues, is the tailender in this year's issue. Before that, the century holders were (with the issue year they were No. 100):

*AA estimate

Warner-Lambert Co., Morris Plains, N.J., the 15th largest national advertiser, increased its domestic advertising nearly 9% to an estimated $294.7 million in 1982.

The company's worldwide sales in 1982 fell 4% from the previous year to $3.25 billion, while net income rose to $175 million from $9.2 million (a victim of nonrecurring charges of $134 million) in 1981.

The improved earnings outlook continued into 1983, as W-L reported six-month earnings of $101.6 million, up 12% from a year ago, although sales continued to slide, dropping 6.4% to $1.55 billion. Figures for 1982 include results of Entenmann's Inc., a baked goods company W-L sold for $317 million to General Foods Corp. last October.

The improved earnings outlook prompted W-L chairman Ward S. Hagan to say he expects "double-digit" income growth in 1983.

The company attributed $320 million of the 1982 sales dropoff to foreign currency adjustments, mostly from the devaluation of the Mexican peso. So far into the new year, the strength of the dollar continues to distort sales.

Excluding the effects of exchange rate changes and divested companies, sales increased 12% in 1982, although the company said such growth came primarily because of price increases rather than to unit volume increases.

The sale of Entenmann's helped put the company's four-year strategic plan for growth into full operation, a W-L spokesman said, noting Entenmann's did not fit the plan.

That strategy involves a 15% increase in advertising spending, expansion of investment in medical products, divestiture of business lines unrelated to corporate strategy and higher spending on research and development—most of which is to go toward pharmaceuticals.

The medical products area is where W-L made its major strategic maneuver during 1982. W-L in August, 1982, acquired IMED Corp., a leader in intravenous infusion devices, for a reported $468 million.

IMED's contribution and Entenmann's absence now means W-L's healthcare business will contribute about 70% rather than the traditional 56% of total sales.

IMED's 1982 sales were about $100 million. W-L says 1983 sales are expected to be "in the range of $150 million" and, by 1987, hit $500 million. IMED holds a 50% market share in the volumetric intravenous pump market.

According to Warner-Lambert, it expects to introduce by mid-1983 a new series of pumps that will be the first to combine the high accuracy of the intravenous pump with the low delivery pressure of the intravenous controller.

W-L's primary business, the healthcare sector, is segmented into ethical and nonprescription products. While the products most highly touted at W-L are its ethical, or prescription drugs, its nonprescription products receive the most attention in W-L's total measured ad spending of $128.6 million, up from $122 million in 1981.

This nonprescription segment, which contributed $811 million in sales in 1982, up only 1% from the previous year, includes mouthwashes, cough and cold products, antacids, vitamins, denture cleansers and other products for personal healthcare.

Six Warner-Lambert products hung on to their market leadership position —Listerine mouthwash, Sinutab sinus relief preparations, Efferdent denture cleanser cleaner tablets, Rolaids antacid, Halls cough drops and e.p.t. (early pregnancy test) for home diagnosis.

Competition heated up in the mouthwash arena, where W-L is the leading marketer with a 30% share held by Listerine. Regular Listermint holds an 11% share. The competition is coming from new mouthwashes containing fluoride, such as Johnson & Johnson's ACT. W-L also has a Listermint with fluoride in Canada, a product also introduced in Venezuela in 1982.

One company official says, "We don't know what will happen in test, but look north of the border and that will tell you what we have in mind." Listerine mouthwash got $5.7 million in measured ad spending, down 24%. Of all W-L products, Listerine antiseptic drew the largest measured ad spending, $11.8 million, up 5.5% from 1981.

Halls, the best-selling cough tablet worldwide, registered a measured media ad increase of 27% to $6.3 million.

E.p.t. ran into intense competition from lower-price kits, W-L reported. However, e.p.t. maintained a market share of more than 50%, with measured ad spending of $3 million, down 6.8%.

Sales of Benylin cough syrup in the U.S. increased 20% partly as a result of heavy spending—$5.5 million ($4.7 million in network and spot tv), a 91% increase over 1981—and the addition of a larger size package.

The company also says a new U.S. advertising campaign helped Myadec, its principal vitamin supplement, register double-digit growth. The campaign stressed the multivitamin's high-potency formula. Ad spending measured $5.3 million, up 24%.

The company also introduced this spring a disposable razor from Schick to compete against market leaders, Bic and Gillette's Good News! disposable razors.

Much of the ad effort was directed at a 58 million starter coupon delivered through newspaper inserts.

Other personal care products receiving $2 million-plus in measured spending last year include: Efferdent denture cleanser tablets, $7.2 million (up 13.5%); Personal Touch ladies razors, $3.4 million (up 69%); Rolaids antacid tablets, $10.5 million (down 7%); Schick Super II cartridge shaver system, $4.3 million (down 26%); Sinutab sinus remedy, $6.4 million (up 10%).

In the gums and mint category, W-L's Trident gum remains in armed combat with Life Saver Inc.'s (a division of Nabisco Brands) Care*Free gum, both with market shares of about 11%.

Venezuela's Health Ministry also banned Adams Gum division of American Chicle from airing its worldwide Dentyne commercial, which it said "promotes poor oral health by recommending chewing Dentyne over toothbrushing."

Products in the gums and mints category contributed $648 million or 20% of total corporate sales. Those that received more than $2 million in ad support were: Bubblicious bubblegum, $4.5 million (down 22%); Certs mints, $9.5 million (down 24%); Certs sugarless mints, $3 million (up from $57,600 in 1981); Chewels sugarless liquid center gum, $2.6 million (down 62%); Clorets gum and mints, $5.2 million (up 50%); Dentyne gum, $7.6 million (up 11%); Halls Freshen-Up gum, $4.4 million (down 7%).

The company also announced in June, 1983, that it was establishing two separate divisions within its consumer products group.

The units, which reflect marketing and distribution distinctions within the company's consumer product operations, are the consumer health products division and the American Chicle division.

The consumer health products division will be headed by Jay M. Gwynne, who was president of W-L's Japan region, and the American Chicle division will be headed by John C. Carroll, who was vp of marketing with American Chicle.

The ethical products in the healthcare segment accounted for sales of $1.29 billion in 1982, a gain of 5% from 1981, and representing about 40% of total 1982 sales.

Over the past two years, new pharmaceuticals have added $100 million to W-L sales, says W-L president Joseph D. Williams.

Among the new products recently introduced are the anti-infective, ERYC (erythromycin); Procan SR, an antiarrhythmic; Easprin, a high-potency coated aspirin; Meclomen, an antiarthritic, and Lopid, a lipid-regulator, which gained a quarter of the U.S. market for lipid and cholesterol control agents in less than a year, the company said.

Amsacre, the company's first anticancer drug, is now on the market in the Netherlands and Canada and is scheduled to be launched in other European markets later this year.

Research and development received renewed emphasis in 1982, with total spending increasing 27% to $145 million, 70% going into ethical pharmaceuticals.

Total 1983 expenditures on r&d are expected to run $180 million, and W-L has said it will spend more than $1 billion on r&d over the next five years, including $100 million for new facilities.

MEASURING MEDIA . . .

Brand Expenditures. A good place to begin . . . a good place to end.

Measuring media for its advertising content is done by independently held companies in co-operation with the media. These measurements provide a breakdown of brand expenditures.

Brand expenditures answer the very first question often asked by advertisers: How much do I have to spend? For it is competitive brand expenditures that indicate how much is necessary to spend to keep up with the competition, or how much it will cost to introduce a new brand into the marketplace; the price of admission. An analysis of brand expenditures can also lend insight to a brand's marketing strategy — the overall media-mix, the selection of the individual vehicles within a particular medium, regionality, seasonal variation, etc. But in the beginning, the question is how much? How much are they spending? How much will I have to spend?

Once a brand's ad budget is determined, the other measurement services come into play to provide additional marketing intelligence: Audience measurement, sales measurement, measurement of the market itself.

Audience measurement, which provides a profile of the reader/viewer/listener helps direct where advertising dollars are to be spent. Naturally, these dollars are going to be placed in those media whose audience has a high buying/usage profile of a particular product type. And within the media, in the magazines, on the programs, and during the dayparts that will reach the heavy user. Determine who the heavy user is, find out what they read, look at and listen to, and you have come a long way in determining where to place ad dollars. Audience measurement: Key marketing intelligence.

Sales measurement — A tracking of product movement, whether it is off the shelf or out of the warehouse, can be a great aid in determining when to spend. Sales measurement provides the sought-after share of market figures, as well as analytical data for those whose bent it is to show advertising effectiveness. Naturally, you spend when your market is buying or shortly before, and data supplied by the sales measurement services tells you when they are buying. This is not necessarily a simple decision. All the money spent on advertising sunglasses during the winter months is not directed at the skiing market. The major manufacturers know sunglasses are an impulse item. Drug and sundry stores buy their sunglass display units in the winter and that is when to advertise. Know thy market — and where it is. In this vast country, there are tremendous regional variations. In Aspen, happiness is a dog and a jeep. The Southeast, for reasons we will not go into here, is a heavy pet food market. The sales measurement services show these seasonal and regional variations of spending patterns.

Measuring the marketplace — Thousands of door-to-door interviews in the field and in the store, are often directly fed back to those interviewed in the creative and copy approach to a particular campaign. Chances are that, "I like its clean, fresh smell" did not come out of a copywriter's head but directly off an interviewer's sheet, tabulated in some editing and coding department in one of the many market measurement companies. A new product or the emphasis of a specific attribute of an existing product comes from ideas expressed in the field — the marketplace — whose measurement is another essential ingredient of marketing intelligence.

All of the major and once minor brands utilize these measurement services. Services are subscribed to, reports received, data analyzed. It is a long and costly process to obtain and review the available information which gives the industry its expertise. At the end of all of the acquisition and analysis of services used to determine how much to spend, where to spend, when to spend and what to say, advertising dollars are spent; time is bought, space purchased. And we come full circle — back to the media measurement services. We tell you who spent, how much, where, when and against whom.

Brand expenditures — A good place to begin . . . a good place to end.

Wendy's International, Dublin, O., the nation's 97th largest advertiser, spent approximately $44.9 million on advertising in 1982, a 21% increase from 1981 expenditures of $37.2 million.

Founded in 1969 by a one-time Kentucky Fried Chicken franchisee, R. David Thomas, Wendy's is one of the youngest major fast-food chains, but also has been one of the industry's fastest growing. For fiscal 1974, less than a decade ago, Wendy's systemwide sales were only $25 million. For fiscal 1982, systemwide sales were $1.63 billion, up 15% from 1981's $1.42 billion and 650 times as large as sales in 1974. According to market-size estimates by the National Restaurant Assn., Wendy's held a 4% share of the fragmented fast-food market in 1982. Last year's earnings of $44.1 million were 20% above 1981's $36.9 million.

Wendy's sales have grown that fast as a result of an aggressive franchise program. At the end of 1974 there were fewer than 100 Wendy's stores in operation. At the close of calendar and fiscal 1982, there were 2,430 units, 9% more than the 2,229 operated at the close of 1981.

Average per-store sales in 1982 were $703,000, up 4% from $674,000 for 1981. This put Wendy's behind McDonald's, which averaged $1.1 million at its stores in 1982, but Wendy's chairman Robert Barney told security analysts in March, 1983, that he expected the chain's average unit volume to hit the $1 million mark within the next five years.

In line with the chain's maturation, Wendy's changed its signage in 1982, giving more play to the logotype and deemphasizing the Wendy character. A new building design also was introduced and used on 85 new and 39 existing restaurants. The upgraded exterior features copper-colored roof panels and decorative awnings and lighting.

Like most other fast-food chains, Wendy's has expanded to international markets. At the end of 1982 there were 125 Wendy's restaurants in nine foreign countries, with an additional 30 planned for 1983. Italy, Hong Kong, Singapore and Mexico were scheduled to see their first Wendy's this year. The five stores operating in Belgium in partnership with J.C. Penney closed down late in 1982 after failing to meet sales and profits expectations.

Wendy's launched its first network tv campaign in 1977, making it the first restaurant chain with fewer than 1,000 stores to go national with its advertising. The "Hot 'n juicy" theme used in that campaign put Wendy's on the marketing map and helped establish it as one of the Big 3 hamburger chains with McDonald's and Burger King.

The chain's national advertising made headlines in 1982 as well. Its campaign, themed "Ain't no reason to go anyplace else," begun in 1981 and featuring chairman and founder R. David Thomas, was criticized for its poor grammar.

In the spring of 1982, the chain dropped the campaign in favor of something more upbeat and linguistically appealing. The new theme was "Wendy's kind of people" but continued the long-standing effort to position Wendy's as the quality leader in the fast-food category.

Wendy's, like McDonald's, was caught offguard by Burger King's "Battle of the Burgers" campaign begun in September, 1982. It's first response was to challenge both its rivals to an independent taste-test competition, but there were no takers.

Wendy's then filed a $25 million lawsuit, claiming Burger King's commercials were "false and deceptive." While McDonald's suit sought an injunction halting the spots, Wendy's went two steps farther, seeking damages and corrective advertising in addition to an order halting their broadcast.

An accord reached out of court in October led Burger King to pull the spots comparing its product to Wendy's. BK's attacks on McDonald's, however, continued in various forms.

Its real response to the Burger King advertising did not come until June, 1983, when Wendy's unveiled a new, $20 million campaign. The "Wendy's kind of people" theme continued, but the new spots compare Wendy's to its competitors more directly and more aggressively than any advertising the chain had aired before.

Created by Chicago's Joe Sedelmaier, the series of humorous tv spots in Wendy's new campaign stress that Wendy's ground beef is fresh while "two famous hamburger places use frozen hamburgers" and that its meals are prepared to order rather than held under heat lamps or reheated in microwave ovens. The other two chains are not named, but the spots leave little room for doubt about who they are.

William Welter, Wendy's senior vp-marketing, predicted the campaign would put an end to the burger wars and establish Wendy's as the quality leader in the category.

A second campaign planned for use in 1983 uses the theme, "Only Wendy" sung to the melody of The Platters' 1950 rock and roll classic, "Only You." The focus of these ads is Wendy's menu offerings, including the chicken sandwich, taco salad, salad bar and Frosty dessert.

Wendy's has consistently targeted adults rather than children with its advertising. Even though its logo features a young girl (founder Thomas' daughter, Wendy), Wendy's doesn't often include children in its commercials, nor does it have a "mascot" comparable to Ronald McDonald or the Burger King.

Wendy's marketing philosophy also differs from those of its two main rivals in limited use of game and premium promotions. Stamp-collector and scratch-card games were popular in 1982, but Wendy's steered clear, partly because of its adult orientation and partly because its ad budget is smaller than those of its competitors. Similarly, Wendy's was among the few major chains in 1983 to resist jumping on the glass-premium bandwagon, choosing instead to redirect most of its promotion budget to tv advertising.

After many years of adherence to its original plan to remain a limited-menu restaurant (the single and double hamburger, chili and Frosty dessert were its principal products throughout the 1970s), Wendy's has begun to broaden its menu. A taco salad was introduced systemwide in 1982 and was backed with heavy media support. In 1983 Wendy's added the bacon cheeseburger and introduced an expanded salad bar branded "The Garden Spot." These additions, too, were supported with subcampaigns.

Continuing in test are a fish sandwich and several regional variations of a breakfast menu (including a breakfast buffet in a few locations). Wendy's also has been the only fast-food hamburger chain to experiment with food items specifically intended to be marketed for dinner only. Among the items tried in the Cincinnati dinner test are beef with mushroom sauce, chicken parmesan and country beef and gravy.

In addition to shepherding the steady growth of the Wendy's system, the company has developed a second restaurant concept, Sisters Chicken & Biscuits. After three years of testing, Wendy's announced late in 1982 that it would begin a nationwide franchising program for the upscale fried-chicken chain. At the close of 1982, 25 of the restaurants were in operation, with two more under construction. However, by March, 1983, the company said it had signed 10 franchise agreements covering development of more than 200 units in eight states. The company said it expected 250 Sisters to be operating by the end of 1985.

In a management realignment in September, 1982, founder R. David Thomas retired as chairman of the company and was appointed senior

Wm. Wrigley Jr. Co., Chicago, the nation's 84th largest advertiser, spent an estimated $67 million on advertising in 1982, up 5.5% from 1981, as its strong earnings performance of the past returned to form.

Net earnings for the year were $35.8 million, an increase of 26% over $28.4 million in 1981, the latter of which was off 7.4% from earnings in 1980. Net sales did not fair so well, dropping 4.3% to $581.5 million, although at least $7 million of the decrease is a result of foreign exchange conversions against a strong dollar.

Wrigley, with 44% of the total gum market sales, continued to be led by its big four—Wrigley's Spearmint, Juicy Fruit, Big Red and Doublemint—for which it spent $40.5 million in measured advertising.

Spearmint and Doublemint, both relying heavily on network and spot tv during 1982, had new advertising campaigns and as a result received most of the money earmarked for the four flagship gums. Advertising for Juicy Fruit remained the same for the third straight year.

Together, the two gums command about 50% of the sugared chewing gum market.

Wrigley continued to support Spearmint with the campaign started in May, 1982. Focused on the "little lift" you get from chewing Spearmint gum, the tv spots carry the theme that "Wrigley's Spearmint gum really keeps you hummin'."

The bouncy theme marked a departure from the low-key Spearmint advertising that some industry analysts had said may have been too quiet and sophisticated to garner enough attention in the highly competitive market.

The campaign helped enliven Spearmint's market share a few points, which had been slipping slightly since the early 1970s when the market suddenly became crowded with new gum entries, says a Wrigley spokesman. Wrigley is still using the campaign.

For Doublemint, Wrigley continued using the theme, "Double your pleasure with Doublemint gum," to reinforce its longtime slogan. The more spirited ads marked Wrigley's final departure from the quiet, low-key ads that characterized its advertising until two years ago.

The Wrigley's sugar chewing gum stable successfully defended its position against Replay, a sugared gum from Life Savers Inc., which maintained less than a 1% share of market after a major introduction in 1980. The renewed vigor of the big four, combined with successes from new market entries and a streamlined management, gives the company a strong outlook for the 1980s, said Ronald Strauss, industry analyst with Wm. Blair Co., Chicago. "It has hit record market shares with some of its gums and the company looks strong in overseas sales," he said.

The only place Wrigley seems vulnerable to competition is in sugarless gum.

Orbit, its first entry into the sugarless market and featuring the artificial sweetener Xylitol in its debut in 1977, has never caught on. In 1982, for example, advertising was nil for the gum, which commanded $4.2 million in measured spending in 1980. Although the company continues to market the gum, it may not last out the year. Sales remain flat, said a company spokesman.

Wrigley has no immediate plans to either reposition Orbit or introduce another sugarless gum, said William Piet, assistant vp-corporate. The question remains as to whether the company wants to or needs to enter the sugar-free marketplace.

One of the successful new lines for Wrigley has been Freedent, a gum for denture wearers sold largely in Plen T Paks of 17 sticks. It received $8 million in measured ad spending in 1982, up 15.8% from 1981. It went the volume route in 1981 after looking at growth by offering more flavors, including cinnamon, its first flavor that was canceled in favor of the Plen T Pak.

Another gum in that packaging format, and one enjoying even more success, is Big Red. Big Red has captured about 8% of the total chewing gum market. Its share has been increasing since its introduction in 1976, says the company.

Big Red really began to blossom once it was repositioned as a breath freshening product in tv spots, and Wrigley has continued with that theme, "Long lasting fresh breath."

The company cut back 3.7% on Big Red advertising to $9 million in 1982, choosing to channel nearly $2 million more in advertising for its Freedent brand.

"We feel excited about Big Red's market share now," said Mr. Piet. The gum has grown 20% a year in sales since its repositioning in 1980, making it one of the fastest-growing gums on the market.

Sales leveled off somewhat during the final two quarters of 1982 and in early 1983, but the gum is still growing at a good clip.

Liquid-center bubble gum continues to be a question mark for Wrigley. Tidal Wave, a current entry produced by Amurol Products, a Wrigley subsidiary, has been a successful performer for Amurol, and Amurol introduced a fourth flavor—apple—in 1982.

Ad spending rose substantially, to almost $1 million in 1982 from $95,800 in 1981, its inaugural year.

"I don't think liquid-center has yet proven itself as a category that's here to stay," said analyst Mr. Strauss.

Wrigley's first entry in 1980 into the liquid-center market, called Over Time, fared poorly was withdrawn from test market.

Another gum aimed at the young market is Big League Chew, a shredded bubble gum that comes in a pouch. Produced by Amurol Products, the gum has yet to achieve much in the way of market share.

Big League Chew, which comes in four flavors, received $790,200 in advertising support during 1982 and another $15,000 for a sweepstakes, virtually identical to 1981 spending levels.

Wrigley's other major entry in the bubble gum category is Hubba Bubba, introduced in 1979 and positioned as a bubble gum with no-stick bubbles. Depending on the region, Hubba Bubba either holds down the No. 2 market position or is fighting to get it from Warner-Lambert's Bubblicious.

Market share leader in the bubble gum category regardless of market is Bubble Yum from Nabisco Brand's Life Savers unit.

Xerox Corp., Stamford, Conn., the country's 71st largest national advertiser, spent an estimated $80 million on advertising in 1982 with a substantial increase coming in measured media—up $12 million last year compared with a $10 million increase the preceding year.

Xerox registered an estimated 5% increase in advertising expenditures for the year, based on restated estimates that attribute $44 million to the unmeasured ad portion of its ad budget in 1981. Its unmeasured support in 1982 is estimated by Advertising Age at $36.8 million.

Over-all performance at Xerox was down. Sales of $8.45 billion were off 1%, which the company blamed on a "weak world economy and increased competition" in every area of the company's business, according to the annual report. The strong American dollar particularly hurt foreign sales, which traditionally contribute more than 40% of sales. Profits dipped 29% from $598 million in 1981 to $424 million in 1982. Per share earnings were off nearly $2.

Xerox has been investing heavily in new products and in research and development, about $1.7 billion worth in 1982, according to company sources. At the same time it has been slashing the payroll; some 12,250 persons were cut from the worldwide staff in less than two years.

This eliminated $300 million from what the company calls its "cost base," but it has also produced at least one lawsuit from employes charging they are being pushed out to make way for younger people.

Magazines sprinted past network tv as the leading weapon in this marketer's advertising arsenal. In the industry estimates, magazines were credited with $18.4 million, a gain of more than $7 million to network tv's $15.8 million, an increase of more than $4 million.

The company used relatively little spot tv. It is active in public tv underwriting. It is a modest cable sponsor with schedules on Cable News Network, Entertainment & Sports Programming Network and superstation WTBS, Atlanta. It also covers the expense of closed captioning President Reagan's live television speeches.

Copying machines and electronic typewriters were the most lavishly funded products on the measured media spending list. The new Memorywriter family claimed 20% of the U.S. electronic typewriter market by the end of 1982.

Xerox's sales troubles were dramatized in July and August when prices for old model copiers were slashed 27% to make way for the introduction of newer models through retailers and distributors.

In the past, Xerox had relied mainly on its own in-house salespeople. Retail store advertising reportedly went from $3 million to $4 million.

One of the new copiers resembled a tv set in one respect. It had a screen at which the customer could peer to see what parts were not working before the repairman came around to fix the machine.

The 1075 was touted as a workhorse capable of handling 70 copies a minute and 25,000 to 100,000 a month. For less demanding customers, there was the smaller Paris 1045, whose monthly output was put at 4,000 to 15,000 copies.

The new copier/duplicator line was introduced to replace incumbent models in hopes of fighting off the Japanese.

At midyear, Xerox's share of the copier market was down to an estimated 45%, mainly because of success by rivals in the medium-size machines. The Japanese had captured many of those customers.

Wall Street observers wondered about Xerox's loyalty to its basic business—the copying trade—when it laid out $1.6 billion in cash and stock in September, 1982, to buy Crum & Forster, an insurer.

David Kearns, Xerox president, admitted the risk in this diversification move, but defended it as a "highly aggressive approach to make Xerox a stronger company."

This buy was made during a weak third quarter when profits plunged 39.2% on a slight sales gain of 2.4%. Part of this decline was attributed to heavy severance pay expenses for massive layoffs.

Two execs, Donald Massaro, vp and head of the office systems division, and David Liddle, a division vp-general manager, left to set up a computer services company of their own. The fourth quarter net dropped still further by 52.4%.

The price cutting on copiers was still going on early in 1983, but the company intensified its marketing efforts in that field.

Price cutting was also going on in the personal computer line. In this area, Xerox remained very much on the fringes compared to strong competitors, including International Business Machines Corp. and Apple Computers.

100 Spending

K mart Corp. and Nabisco Brands each dropped two notches to No. 8 and No. 9, respectively, and American Home Products Corp. jumped into the tenth position from No. 16 last year.

Newcomers to the 100 Leading Advertisers report this year are Royal Crown Cos., Stroh Brewery Co. and Wendy's International. Returnees are E&J Gallo Winery, Mazda Motors of America and Pan American World Airways.

Royal Crown boosted its ad spending by 33% to $50.3 million, backing its RC Cola, Diet Rite, RC100 and Nehi soft drink brands and Arby's fast-food restaurants. The company started the caffeine-free soft drink bandwagon rolling in 1980 with its RC 100 Sugar Free and, more recently, the sodium free category. It is the 92nd ranking national advertiser.

Stroh Brewing Co. made the top 100 because of its acquisition of Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. in spring, 1982. As our profile notes, even though Stroh drastically cut Schlitz's spending, the combined Schlitz and Stroh advertising caused a 243% increase in Stroh's spending, jumping from $16.2 million to $55.5 million. Stroh is ranked No. 90 on the Leaders list.

Wendy's International advertised enough hamburgers and the like to propel it to No. 97 in our ranking. The fast-food company, one of the industry's fastest growing, spent almost all of its advertising budget in spot and network tv, with small amounts going to radio and outdoor.

Companies missing from this year's report are Borden Inc., Exxon Corp., Jeffrey Martin Inc. and Morton Thiokol (formerly MortonNorwich). Morton Thiokol's spending decreased substantially when it sold its Norwich-Eaton division—and its heavily advertised consumer products—to Procter & Gamble in 1982.

Additionally, these companies have been affected by mergers and are discussed in new parent company profiles: Columbia Pictures (now owned by Coca-Cola Co.), Heublein Inc. (now part of R.J. Reynolds Industries) and Jos. Schlitz Brewing Co. (now owned by Stroh Brewing Co.)

The following companies decreased their advertising last year. The companies are listed with the percentage of spending decreases in descending order: Greyhound Corp., −0.6; Esmark Inc., −1.1%; Nabisco Brands, −1.6%; American Cyanamid Co., −3.3%; General Electric Co., 3.5%; Chesebrough-Ponds, −3.8%; Trans World Corp., −3.8%; Brown-Forman Distillers Corp., −5.1%; Gillette Co., −5.2%; Clorox Co., −5.6%; Union Carbide, −7.0%; Time Inc., −7.8% Polaroid Corp., −10.2%; UAL Inc., −10.3%; Chrysler Corp., −10.4%; E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., −11.5%; General Foods Corp., −11.8%; American Brands, −12.0%; Richardson-Vicks, −13.2%; RCA Corp., −23.3%, and Loew's Corp., −27.0%.

Some of the companies that cut their spending did so because of difficulties coping with the economy—reduced sales because of the recession—while cuts by others were dictated by changing strategies.

Polaroid Corp, for example, cited the "continuing worldwide recession for [its] ills, which included a 9% drop in worldwide sales . . . ," while Loews Corp. mentioned the economy and a competitive marketplace. General Electric dropped advertising by 3% and changed the empahisis from individual product categories to image-building efforts and multiproduct advertising.

General Foods, while it dropped spending by nearly 12%, said that it actually maintained the same ratio of ad expenditures to net sales as the previous year.

Chrysler Corp., on the other hand, had increased sales and a great increase in earnings but reduced ad spending as a strategic move, down from the "frenzy levels of 1981." The medium most affected by its spending cuts was spot radio.

American Broadcasting Cos. brings up the bottom of the leaders list at No. 100. Ironically, ABC is the top ranked company in ADVERTISING AGE'S 100 Leading Media Companies issue this year (AA, June 27). The company had media revenues of $2.53 billion in 1982, or 95% of its total revenues of $2.66 billion. Its 1982 advertising spending, however, was $42.8 million, a 7% increase from 1981's $40 million.

The other two network broadcasting giants, RCA Corp., owner of NBC, and CBS Inc., were ranked No. 38 and No. 41, respectively, on the advertising leaders list, with spending of $160.1 million and $159 million. CBS ranked No. 2 in the media companies ranking and RCA was No. 4.

AT&T, this year's seventh ranked advertiser, will leave the 100 Leaders list in its current form because of the breakup of the communications giant, but next year's list could see several of the newly independent divisions or companies that the divestiture is creating.

For instance, one or more of the seven independent regional organizations, such as Ameritech, the phone company that will serve the Midwest region, or Nynex, the Northeast area phone company, could emerge as top advertisers.

The most noticeable change in the leaders' media mix was in spot tv. The 100 companies profiled here increased their spot tv expenditures by 20.1% to $2.18 billion. Network tv garnered $4.84 billion, 12.9% more than in 1981. Newspapers' spending, over-all, increased 3.2% in 1982, to $962 million; magazines were up 6.7% to $1.72 billion; spot radio spending drew $418 million, or 3% more than 1981.

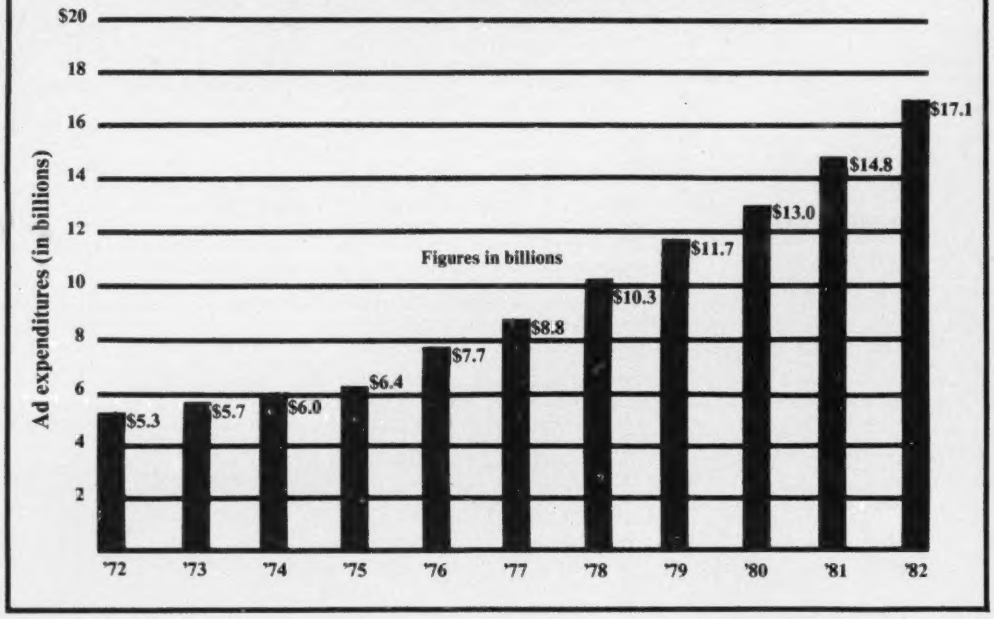
The only media that received decreased amounts from leaders in 1982 were farm publications, down 10.3% to $23.7 million, and network radio—down 4.7% to $131.4 million.

Outdoor advertising emerged from 1982 as the truly hot medium among leading national advertisers, attracting $299 million, up 27.1% in 1982.

Of the $18.84 billion invested by national advertisers in eight media last year, more than 56% came from the 100 Leading National Advertisers. Among all measured media, the total increase of leaders' share was 11.9% to $10.57 billion.

A decade of spending growth

Tracking the rise in total ad spending by the 100 Leaders



Where Ad Age got its data

Advertising figures listed for each of the 100 Leading National Advertisers include measured media expenditures published by various statistical bureaus and associations. These include the following: Leading National Advertisers Inc., Agricultural Marketing Information Service (AGRICOM), Radio Advertising Bureau and Media Records.

In the eight measured media—newspapers, magazines, farm publications, spot and network tv, spot and network radio and outdoor—the 100 Leaders dominate, accounting for 56.1% of all advertising dollars invested in those media. (See chart on Page 24.)

In addition to the measured media figure, an unmeasured spending figure is added to arrive at the total ad expenditures each company registers.

These unmeasured expenditures include point-of-purchase advertising, couponing, direct mail, premiums and other forms of national sales promotion.

ADVERTISING AGE would like to make it clear that the selection of 100 Leading National Advertisers is based on measured media expenditures only, while final ranking is based on the combined total of measured and unmeasured figures.

If other criteria were used, advertisers not now on our list would be included. Among them would be those companies that spend many millions annually in local advertising, which is not measured, and relatively little in national advertising. Such companies include many large retailers.

MCM: Most-computer-managed agency?

Executives envision not only copy, but design work on PCs

By GAY JERVEY

New York—The offices of Muir Cornelius Moore aren't unique. Like those of many ad agencies here, they are on Third, not Madison Ave. and, like many, they overflow onto several floors.

They also sport wet-paint signs. ladders, arrows pointing to unfinished work spaces and new furniture. In short, expansion.

But in the midst of all this commotion stands an item of irresolute calm and command: An IBM Series 1 computer that symbolizes the Muir Cornelius Moore modus operandi that has been midwife to the wet-paint signs, the orange crates and the spiraling payroll.

"There is not a more computerized agency anywhere," said its chairman Bill Muir, as he patted the Series 1 proudly and tapped its keys to strut its stuff. "All of our branch offices [three] are linked into our main computer, and we are committed to putting an IBM personal computer in every one of our executives' offices.

"We have been at the right place at the right time," said Mr. Muir, the partner who brought the agency principals together. "We decided to concentrate early on the businesses that are growing, specifically computer systems, aerospace and financial services—business to business. And a significant part of our growth comes from services that are not 'traditional' when you think of an agency."

Russ vodka sales seen down drain

By GAY JERVEY

U.S. sales of the popular Russian imported vodka, Stolichnaya, are expected to suffer—some say dramatically—from the recent Soviet destruction of Korean Air Lines flight 007 and the world outrage over the deaths of its 269 passengers and crew.

As furor over the incident intensified last week, anti-Stolichnaya clamor escalated. For many members of the liquor industry—and more than a few "Stolly" drinkers—indicting the brand became a tangible, active way to punish the USSR for the senseless killings.

But for Monsieur Henri Wines Ltd., the Purchase, N.Y.-based company that imports Stolichnaya, history is cruelly repeating itself.

During 1980, Russian tanks rolled into Afghanistan, the U.S. boycotted the Olympics and a grain embargo was imposed. The up-

Major fast-fooders locking horns again

By CHRISTY MARSHALL and SCOTT HUME

The battle of the burgers is far from over.

Burger King today begins running commercials touting "the big switch." One spot features the MacDonalds, a real family that switched from eating at the No. 1 fast-food chain. McDonald's, to Burger King.

The Miami-based chain says it will back this campaign with the greatest media weight in its history, $45 million, with tv time accounting for 85% of the allotted funds (AA, Aug. 29). The BK ad budget for the calendar year stands at $85 million.

Meanwhile, Wendy's International is testing a repositioning of its basic hamburger and reviving its network tv campaign—moves that reflect a newly assumed competitive stance.

The chain is advertising in Seattle a "new Hot & Juicy" hamburger that essentially is the basic Wendy's Single hamburger put on a 20% larger bun with 25% more condiments topping it.

The point of the test is to fight the common perception that McDonald's Big Mac and Burger King's Whopper are larger than Wendy's Single—and to give it a comparably distinctive name.

As for the "real" McDonald's, the Oak Brook, Ill.-based chain is planning a major pre-Christmas promotion featuring Mattel Toys' Hot Wheels line.

While both companies

Decisions near in $150 million worldwide review

Beecham to trim agencies

By EUGENE BACOT

London—Beecham Group is planning a major realignment of its agencies worldwide. Some of the 50 shops on its roster may lose out.

At stake is more than $150 million in advertising, with the hefty U.K. portion presently split among Ogilvy & Mather, D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius, Fletcher Shelton Delaney, Ted Bates Ltd., Leo Burnett Co., Doyle Dane Bernbach, J. Walter Thompson Co. and Royds Advertising.

In the U.S., Beecham spends about $80 million in measured media advertising.

Senior management at Beecham's corporate headquarters here confirm they are putting finishing touches to the review, but will not disclose what strategies are being considered. Results are expected within three weeks.

The restructuring is believed to cover all markets where Beecham operates, including the U.S., Europe, the Middle East, Far East and Latin America. Worldwide sales of Beecham consumer goods (excluding pharmaceuticals) top $1.77 billion.

Beecham insiders say the British-based multinational marketer of toiletries, household goods, food and pharmaceuticals is seeking cost-saving and efficiencies in two areas: Reducing duplication among agencies and reaping the benefits of transnational campaigns which carry a similar message across national boundaries.

The company is anxious to carry successful campaigns into other parts of the world based on the experience of selected agencies in handling Beecham brands.

The problems will come from client conflicts among agencies if Beecham seeks realignment through the major networks.

For example, in the U.K., Burnett has links with both Beecham and Nestle, while D'Arcy has worldwide links with Colgate-Palmolive. Burnett, in fact, is seen by some sources as a potentially major victim of a consolidation because of its strong ties to Procter & Gamble Co.

Ogilvy & Mather handles Beecham toiletry products in Europe, Latin America, the Middle East and Africa. While it handles only food brands for rival Unilever here, not toiletries, it does handle Lever Bros. toiletries in the U.S.#

Warren, Mich.—Chevrolet is making major tv sports buys to support its 1984 models, including 43 World Series spots, largest single sponsorship of the Super Bowl, exclusive auto sponsorship of the Winter Olympics and heavy buys for the summer games. Chevy general marketing manager Tom Staudt also said the company is considering producing wholly sponsored tv shows. Chevy said media ad spending this model year (see earlier story on Page 3) will be up just enough to cover inflation; in calendar 1982 it spent an estimated $134 million, via Campbell-Ewald. Public tv near a 'go' with enhanced IDs

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—The government panel studying ways to meet public tv's financial needs is leaning toward an advertising recommendation that already has drawn a skeptical reaction from the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies.

When the Temporary Commission on Alternative Financing holds a key meeting Sept. 13, insiders expect it will endorse a recommendation favoring "enhanced" on-air credits for public tv program underwriters, but not standard commercials.

The enhancement most likely would mean underwriters could mention brand names of their products when they identify themselves, something they are not now permitted to do.

The chairman of the 11-member panel, which includes four members of Congress, is Federal Communications Commission member James H. Quello.

Last week he said that enhanced underwriting credits look more viable to him than the standard 30-second and 60-second commercials sold by a handful of stations in a test authorized by Congress.

Mr. Quello's view differs from the advice he quietly sought from Four A's this summer.

Though not advocating that ads be permitted on public tv, Four A's president Leonard S. Matthews wrote that the just-completed experiment showed public stations can generate substantial revenues

CBS, ABC plan cross-promotions

Nets fine-tune lineups

By JAMES P. FORKAN

NEW YORK—Agencies, advertisers and affiliated stations tracking the new tv season kept erasers at the ready as the three tv networks continued to fine-tune the program calendar, for both the final preseason dates and the early weeks of the fall season.

CBS will begin "After M*A*S*H" on Sept. 26 with an hour episode rather than the half-hour earlier planned, delaying "Newhart's" return to Oct. 3. Thus, CBS will have two long-form series openers on Sept. 26, with "Emerald Point NAS" earlier set for a two-hour episode. "Emerald Point's" competition will include NBC's tv drama "Sessions," which bumped the planned two-hour first-run "Little House on the Prairie," whose new air date has not been fixed.

Two early cross-promotion series stunts emerged last week. One will find Boss Hogg and Enos from the "Dukes of Hazzard" guesting on the Oct. 2 "Alice" premiere on CBS and Ben Murphy and Marshall Colt of ABC's "Lottery" appearing on "That's Incredible" for a Sept. 19 lottery-related story segment. To justify the "Alice" crossover, CBS said Boss Hogg will be identified as a "distant relative" of Jolene, the southern waitress on "Alice." Later this fall, NBC said, "Diff'rent Strokes" will feature Mr. T of "The A Team" as a guest.

Also on Oct. 2, "The Jeffersons" will begin a three-episode storyline.

CBS last week booked "Carpool," a tv movie comedy, as its Oct. 5 movie title against NBC's baseball playoff coverage. So far, no other movies have been chosen to counter the playoffs or ABC's subsequent World Series telecasts.

Later in October, according to various industry sources, NBC is planning to repeat "Animal House" on Oct. 9, the made-for-tv "Women of San Quentin" (bumped from Oct. 16 by "High School USA") on Oct. 17, "A Haunting Passion" on either Oct. 24 or 31 and "The Elephant Man" Oct. 30.

On the series side, Katz Communications executives said that viewers will notice when "St. Elsewhere" returns in October that it has become "lighter, less dramatic" than last season; newcomers "Manimal" and "Boone" also will be lighter than first thought, the sales rep added.

Looking ahead to November, "Chiefs," the six-hour CBS miniseries, now has been slotted in that sweeps period, as expected (AA, Aug. 29). CBS said last week that the miniseries will air on Nov. 13, 15 and 16. CBS' decision to go with three movie nights this fall, which surprised most admen when announced last spring, was explained as sensible, in part, because of its backlog of made-for-tv movies and because the movie nights were ideal for its miniseries. "Chiefs," will fill movie slots on two nights

United Air takes shine to Florida

By SCOTT HUME

United Airlines is sending Al E. Gator back to the swamp.

In early November, the nation's largest air carrier will break what it calls a more aggressive campaign for its Florida routes.

The animated alligator character used since January, 1981, as spokesman for the lucrative vacation routes is being replaced by a campaign themed: "United shines to Florida."

As a unifying visual effect, each of the new commercials features a glowing sun spot glittering on a coffee cup, sandy beach or other element.

The new advertising replaces the light tone of the Al E. Gator effort with a competitive message that emphasizes United's leadership in nonstop service to the state.

"The campaign positions us where we belong: As the largest carrier to Florida," said Bill Alenson, United's director of advertising. "Al did a terrific job of getting awareness for our Florida routes, but these spots are a bit more aggressive. They say loud and clear, 'United is the leader.' "

Census looks West for fastest growth

WASHINGTON—Marketers plotting a Sunbelt course for the rest of this century got a new navigational fix from the U.S. Census Bureau last week.

It predicted the 1970s population boom in the South and West is likely to continue through the 1990s.

If anything, said bureau demographer Signe Wetrogan, "the trends are more accentuated" than the government believed when it published its last forecast five years ago.

"If they continue, we'll be seeing significant changes in population distribution," she said.

California, Florida and Texas are each expected to gain 6 million residents between now and the end of the century, according to the bureau.

California will remain the nation's most populous state, and Texas and Florida will climb at the expense of New York. Pennsylvania, Illinois and Ohio will each drop a notch in the rankings of most populous states, but New York will drop two places, from second to fourth.

The states with the highest predicted percentage growth rates in the 1980s and 1990s are: Nevada, 59% in the 1980s and 50% in the 1990s; Wyoming, 48% and 43%; Arizona, 46% and 40%; Utah, 39% and 36%; Florida, 37% and 31%; Alaska, 30% and 21%; Colorado, 30% and 24%; Idaho, 28% and 25%; Oregon, 26% and 21%, and New Hampshire, 23% and 20%.

Population losses over the 1980s and 1990s are expected in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and the District of Columbia. Losses are forecast to begin in the 1990s for Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa and South Dakota.

The new forecast markedly changes expectations for the nine-state Northeast region. Predictions of modest population growth for the Northeast, made five years ago, are replaced in the current report by a forecast of steady population erosion.

By contrast, bureau experts now say the 13-state West region, rather than the 16-state South (plus the District of Columbia) is the best bet to be the fastest-growing area through 2000.

Population growth for the 12-state North Central region, predicted as modest but steady five years ago, is expected to be marginal in the 1980s and then decline in the 1990s, Ms. Wetrogan said.

Nationally, the bureau predicted the U.S. population growth rate will increase to 9.72% over the 1980s from 8.95% in the 1970s.

Regionally, the Census Bureau predicted population in the 13-state West region, particularly the Mountain States, will climb 22.2% by 1990, and another 18.1% from 1990 to 2000.

Though it includes California, the nation's most populous state, the West was still the most lightly populated region in 1980, with 19% of the national total. By 2000, however, the bureau said it will be the second most-populous region, accounting for 23.4% of all Americans.

The South, with 33.27% of Americans in 1980, is expected to grow 15.92% in the 1990s and have 35.15% of the national population by the end of the decade.

In the 1990s, the South region is forecast to post 12.8% growth, giving it 36.95% of the national total in 2000.

The census forecast said the North Central region, which held 26% of the population in 1980, will grow 2.1% over the 1980s, but slip to 24.2% of the national total by 1990. In the 1990s, the region will show a net decline of 0.9%, with its share of the national total dropping to 22.3%, the bureau predicted.

While New Hampshire expects robust population growth, the picture was grimmer for the rest of the Northeast: The 1980s are expected to see a decline of 1.66% in the region's population, with its national share dropping to 19.4% in 1990 from 1980's 21.7%.

In the 1990s, the predicted losses increase to 4.18% over the decade, and the region's national share is expected to slip to 17.35%.

By age group, the West will have the youngest age distribution, with only 11% of its population older than 65 and 22% younger than 15, the census predicted. The Northeast will continue to have the oldest age distribution, with about 15% of its population age 65 and older.

The census report, "Provisional Projections of the Population of States by Age and Sex," projected from fertility, migration and migration data, is available for $4 from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington 20402.#

Five upscale magazines battle for the epicurean market

By Charlene Canape

Bill and Mary Morgan are a professional working couple who spend long hours at their jobs. After a grueling day, they come home ready to relax. But instead of flopping on the sofa and watching tv, the Morgans are more likely to don aprons and head for the kitchen, where they will create a gourmet meal for two.

There is a food revolution going on in America. "Cookbooks are selling at a better rate than the Bible," says John S. Connors, publisher of Food & Wine, one of the five cooking magazines prospering in this atmosphere. Adds Robert S. Phelps, publisher of Bon Appetit: "The food enthusiast is continuing to grow in numbers. The blurring of roles and the increase in the number of working people has made cooks out of people who wouldn't have been cooks 10 years ago."

In their parents' time, Bill and Mary Morgan would have had difficulty finding even one magazine that catered to their preoccupation with cooking, let alone the five competing for their attention. Except for Gourmet, which is still family-operated, these magazines are owned by major publishers intent on making their entry in this field the premier authority on food. Bon Appetit, the largest, with a circulation of 1.3 million, is owned by Knapp Communications, also publisher of Architectural Digest. Cuisine is owned by CBS, Food & Wine by American Express Publishing and the Cook's Magazine recently sold more than a 50% interest to The New Yorker. Even Gourmet may not stay independent for long. The New York Times Co. has had its eye on the magazine for several years. Gourmet founder Earle MacAusland died in 1980, and some observers believe his wife, Jean, who is now running the magazine, may be more agreeable to selling.

Already this group of magazines has been dubbed the epicurean field and is attracting the attention of advertisers eager to reach the Bill and Mary Morgans. It is easy to see why advertisers are enthusiastic: The serious cook is a potential customer for a wide variety of products, from microwave ovens to food processors and gourmet cookware. An interest in good food usually includes a desire to travel to a multitude of gourmet spots around the globe. In addition, the food connoisseur often appreciates the best in everything—automobiles, liquor, jewelry, furniture and objets d'art. As a result, these food magazines have enlisted a healthy roster of advertisers of luxury goods.

Although these magazines have food as their basic theme, they are choosy about which food ads appear in their pages. While advertisements for basic food ingredients like butter or yeast usually are accepted without question, advertisements for prepared foods are carefully scrutinized.

The Cook's Magazine, because "cooking from scratch" is its creed, is most likely to reject a prepared food ad. It recently turned away a potential back cover advertisement for bottled salad dressing. "We would never tell people to use bottled salad dressing," says editor Mary Goodbody. "If I had a recipe that called for French dressing, I would tell them how to make it, not to buy a bottle of it."

Gourmet also rejects most prepared food ads. "We don't like supermarket ads —cereals, or things like that," says Ada Ross, Gourmet's advertising office manager. "We took a Stouffer's ad because we were pushed into it." Robert E. Cowger, circulation director of Gourmet, says the magazine received complaints from its readers after it ran that Stouffer's ad.

These policies have created some tension on Madison Avenue. "An editorial policy which reinforces the perception that convenience foods, prepared foods, are less good than their converse is really helping to enforce something that has no basis in scientific fact," says David K. Braun, director of media services at General Foods. "It ignores the fact that a tremendous proportion of the population in this country would not be able to do without prepared foods. And some of them make pretty delicious, attractive dishes, too."

Jim Deal

One of the General Food's products, Jell-O, was singled out by Cuisine publisher Anne Sutherland Fuchs as typifying ads the magazine does not want. She was quoted as saying, "You can't get a Jell-O ad in the morning and go after a Mercedes in the afternoon."

Now, however, Mrs. Fuchs emphasizes that Cuisine judges each ad individually. The Jell-O ad still is unacceptable, because the product is aimed at families with "eight children and a mother 18 to 34 years old," she says. But Cuisine will take ads for prepared foods that are appropriate for an upscale audience. Cuisine's September issue includes ads for Kraft salad dressing, Hidden Valley Ranch salad dressing and Stouffer's side dishes. "Stouffer's is a premium-priced product, and the people who can afford it are more upscale," she says.

Stouffer's also has been warmly welcomed at Bon Appetit. In the March issue, the company ran a gatefold ad that featured photos of 28 of its entrees, crepes and side dishes. David R. Alexander, Stouffer's marketing manager for entrees and side dishes, says the ad was designed to convey the large variety of products the company now makes. And in contrast to the complaints registered by Gourmet readers to the Stouffer's ad, Mr. Alexander says: "We have had some response from consumers that they have used that [Bon Appetit] gatefold as a shopping guide."

Bon Appetit also uses prepared foods in some of its recipes, notably in the column "Too Busy to Cook." "The column is designed so that you can come home after a busy day, open the pantry and use what's there to make something that you're proud of and that's very tasty," says editor Marilou Vaughan.

The epicurean magazine field has evolved in the last few years. Before that time, there were only the two "pioneers," Gourmet and Bon Appetit. These magazines continue to be the furthest apart in their editorial and advertising philosophies. Gourmet eschews being identified as only a food magazine and on its cover carries the description, "The Magazine of Good Living." It has gained the reputation of being a coffee table book with attractive photographs of dishes that readers like to look at but would never attempt. Gourmet carries regular restaurant reviews because the editors assume their readers dine out frequently. The magazine is travel oriented, often carrying features on exotic locales that have little to do with food.

In contrast, Bon Appetit expects its readers to be in the kitchen with their sleeves rolled up trying recipes in the latest issue. The magazine strives to demystify food preparation, often carrying photographs that demonstrate various food techniques. Bon Appetit executives are proud of saying the magazine will spend many hours in the kitchen and emerge spattered and stained, evidence that it is being used.

Cuisine, Food & Wine and the Cook's Magazine now fill in the gap between Gourmet and Bon Appetit. And while Bon Appetit is weathering the newer competition successfully, Gourmet is showing the strain.

Throughout its 42-year history, Gourmet has never before had to worry about meeting its rate base. The magazine always had been proud that it was delivering a bonus to its advertisers. This year, however, circulation slipped below 650,000, and though advertisers weren't ready to pull out, many began asking questions. Gourmet's officials took steps to shore up readership: For the first time it was included in the Publishers Clearing House solicitation, and it sent out a mailing of 400,000, offering subscribers a discount, something the magazine has been loathe to do in the past.

As a result, Gourmet's circulation has risen. But it is clear the family-run magazine is having difficulty competing with the publishing giants that have entered the field.

Mr. Cowger, Gourmet's circulation director, holds up direct mail solicitations from Cuisine and Bon Appetit, evidence of the constant competition Gourmet now faces. "These two magazines are continually beating the bushes with promos," he says.

Gourmet also is making editorial changes to counter claims its recipes are too difficult. The magazine has avoided listing the ingredients before each recipe, believing such lists looked unattractive. Readers attempting a dish had to read the entire recipe to see what ingredients were needed, a chore that would discourage even the most avid cook. In February, the editors began to list the ingredients, but in paragraph form, again because of appearance. Executive editor Gail Zweigenthal admits that form was unworkable and says the ingredients soon will be listed in column form.

Mr. Cowger concedes that at one time the recipes were too challenging. "We had a phase when the senior editor in the kitchen was an absolute French chef purist," he says. "I think she felt if you didn't spend a day in the kitchen you weren't cooking." Now, however, Ms. Zweigenthal says that of 100 recipes run each month, at least 50 are not difficult.

Yet Gourmet has limits on how far it wil go to assist the novice cook. Ms. Zweigenthal says the instructional photographs that appear in other food magazines will never be found in Gourmet. "One of the things we're interested in being is a beautiful magazine," she says. "All of those hands doing things," she shakes her head. "I don't find them useful."

Serious competition is a new experience for Gourmet, begun by Earle MacAusland in 1941, to cater to that affluent segment of the population that enjoyed good living. It was for many years the only magazine of its type. "He [Mr. MacAusland] was Mr. Gourmet; he lived that way 24 hours a day," says Mr. Cowger, who has been a close family friend since 1953. "Everything the man owned was the finest. He always shunned publicity, any kind of show or splash or flash. He loved to cook. I remember when I was spending time at his summer house on Nantucket and found him in the kitchen shelling shrimp. It was the only time I ever saw him without his jacket."

Mr. MacAusland faithfully brought his love of the finer things in life to the pages of his magazine. "In all respects, he never deviated from his principles of where he wanted Gourmet to be," says Mr. Cowger. "He would refuse ads he didn't want back in the days when he was struggling for existence."

Mrs. MacAusland has held to her husband's policies. Gourmet remains selective about its advertisers, and food makes up a scant 4.8% of Gourmet's total advertising. "It's frustrating for the sales people here," Mr. Cowger admits. "They can go out and sell ads and we won't take them."

Gourmet will take cigaret and other tobacco product ads, another reflection of Mr. MacAusland's philosophy. "We get flak [from subscribers] for running cigaret ads, but Mr. MacAusland felt that smoking a good cigar was part of good living," says Mr. Cowger.

For years, other publishers found it difficult to break Gourmet's hold on the market. Both CBS and Triangle Publications, which publishes TV Guide, launched food magazines, only to scuttle them after a few issues.

But CBS never abandoned its desire to have an entry in this market. When Cuisine went bankrupt in 1982, CBS moved in to take over. Officials of CBS Publishing have been slowly refurbishing the magazine, resisting the temptation to redo it overnight. The entire editorial staff, from editor Patricia Brown on down, was invited to stay. CBS did, however, bring in a new publisher, Anne Sutherland Fuchs, who was already at CBS Publishing, serving as vp and publisher of special projects in the women's group, which includes Woman's Day. Mrs. Fuchs believes each of the magazines in the epicurean field is unique. Her job, as she views it, is to make Cuisine stand out even more.

With its September issue, Cuisine unveiled its latest advertising campaign, "Cuisine comes out of the kitchen." The magazine intends to focus more on the pleasures of dining, entertaining and travel, and less on the actual mechanics of food preparation. The October cover story features Art Buchwald and his reflections on food. There will be other well known writers from other fields appearing in the pages of Cuisine.

Each change Cuisine has made is intended to upgrade the magazine's quality another notch. Some observers believe CBS is blatantly imitating Gourmet. For example, reminiscent of Gourmet's identity as "The magazine of good living," Cuisine began to carry on its cover the description, "The magazine of fine food and gracious living." Gourmet has become known for its high-quality paper and lush four-color photographs. Cuisine's paper quality has been increased twice—in September, 1982, and again in February. The magazine also has increased its use of four-color. "Cuisine is an art director's dream," says Mrs. Fuchs, the publisher. "The editors can use as much four-color as they want."

> The food connoisseur appreciates the best in everything—automobiles, liquor, jewelry, furniture, objets d'art. As a result, the food magazines have a healthy roster of luxury goods advertisers.

After she took over, Mrs. Fuchs began talking about upgrading the magazine's advertising. She has softened her tone somewhat, but only because she believes the advertising community has gotten her message. "We had to make some strong statements in the beginning in order to survive," she says. "It's important to make a decision and have direction and offer advertisers a specific marketing segment." Mrs. Fuchs says Cuisine has not been faced with the distasteful task of turning away advertisers recently because the magazine's marketing position is now clear.

Soon after acquiring Cuisine, CBS reduced its rate base from 750,000 to 725,000. Even then, Mrs. Fuchs says, the magazine made that circulation, "by the skin of its teeth." From December, 1982, until June, Cuisine increased to 785,000.

That increase came despite a cover price increase, from $1.75 to $2. "The response has been phenomenal," says Mrs. Fuchs. "Now that we are at least 750,000, we can begin to market Cuisine in terms of quality."

She says that during the first six months of 1983, Cuisine brought in 50 new advertisers. Still, revenues dropped 12.4% for the first six months of 1983, compared with the same period in 1982. Advertising pages declined more than 15%, from 247 to 208.

The magazine is looking for a turnaround in the second half. Cuisine officials say it will be up 64% in pages for the third quarter of 1983 compared to the same period in 1982. Two new categories have been added, personal care in September and cosmetics in October. Ads in other categories, notably travel, finance and wines and spirits, also have been increasing.

Like Gourmet and Cuisine, Food & Wine has been cautious about admitting advertisers to its pages. Purchased by American Express Publishing in 1980, the magazine was launched in 1978 as the International Review of Food & Wine. "There are some who believe that a startup magazine should accept all advertisements it can get because it's all money," says Mr. Connors, the publisher. "But I'm a believer that the bad will force out the good."

Food & Wine has turned away much mail-order advertising, either because it is unattractive or extravagant in its claims, says Mr. Connors. Sticking to this restrictive philosophy may be difficult in economic hard times, but he is convinced it has resulted in a mix that enhances the already expensive look of the magazine.

Food & Wine is beginning to reap the rewards of its policy. For January through June, advertising revenues increased a whopping 130%, and ad pages increased almost 42%, compared with the same period in 1982. Circulation has grown to 500,000, two and one-half times what it was when American Express bought it.

However, Food & Wine's method for increasing its circulation and advertising has created controversy in the advertising community, while also pointing out the advantage of having a major corporation as a parent. A Food & Wine subscriber who is also an American Express cardholder can request to have his subscription automatically renewed with the cost billed to his credit card account. Anyone who wants to stop his subscription must write in and say so, however. "What person is going to take the time to write in and ask about taking that subscription off?" asks one publishing executive. "It clearly gives the magazine some circulation advantage." Competitors also are eager to point out that American Express itself purchases a generous number of advertising pages in Food & Wine (it took 7% of the magazine's total January to June ad pages).

Editorially, Food & Wine takes a relaxed approach toward food. While it does not ignore the dishes of the Far East and Europe—its September issue concentrates on Italy—it puts more emphasis on American cooking. The magazine does not insist everything should be prepared from scratch. "A few months ago, we found that by buying store-bought puff pastry and giving it an extra roll, you can come up with a very good puff pastry," says editor William Rice. "We're not afraid to say that to our readers." Mr. Rice says his staff is constantly searching for such valid shortcuts. "People have a more relaxed attitude about food right now," he says. "What we're trying to do is to get them to prepare food better."

That editorial philosophy allows a place for some prepared-food advertising, provided the artwork is attractive. For instance, the August issue carried ads for Hormel bacon bits, Country Cuisine spaghetti sauce and Lucca frozen cheese raviolli. "There's no reason to do everything yourself," Mr. Rice says. "You can cook one course and buy the rest. What you buy is as much a reflection as what you cook." He adds: "Food & Wine is in the middle [of this field of magazines], and we should be. We look attractive on a table, and we get picked up and used."

If Mr. Rice is more relaxed about food, it is because he is very confident in the kitchen. Of the five food editors, he is the only one with formal culinary training. He studied at the Cordon Bleu school in Paris, the Culinary Institute of America, Hyde Park, N.Y., and Les Amis du Vin, an international wine society.

Epicurean

While in France, Mr. Rice worked as a cook in a restaurant in Burgundy and picked grapes in Bordeaux. He came to Food & Wine in 1980 after being executive food editor of the Washington Post, where he wrote for and edited two weekly food sections and a wine column.

According to Mr. Connors, Food & Wine also strives to keep its readers up to date on happenings in the food world. As part of this strategy, Mr. Rice and other members of his staff have been courting up-and-coming chefs, encouraging them to create for the magazine. As part of the lure, Food & Wine is constructing a model kitchen that visiting chefs may use. That kitchen is only one of six being constructed by the magazine at its headquarters in Manhattan. When completed, Food & Wine's test kitchens will be the most elaborate of any food magazine.

Ms. Fuchs

Cuisine

American Express also is looking for other ways to market Food & Wine's name. The magazine developed a promotion with Macy's in California, a food and wine festival that included a booklet of the magazine's recipes. More such events are planned. "If you didn't do such promotions, it would take you five years to become well known," says Mr. Connors.

Anyone who studied the food magazine field back in 1979 might have concluded that with four magazines already being published, there was little room for another. Yet Christopher Kimball concluded that no one else was doing the job that he expected from a food magazine. "I wanted a magazine that would tell how a recipe was developed and explain the techniques," he says.

The idea, according to Mr. Kimball, was to own a small corner of a large market—those 100,000 to 200,000 cook hobbyists who are intent on improving their cooking skills, avoiding shortcuts, insisting on using fresh ingredients when possible and wanting to make everything from scratch. The Cook's Magazine, which comes out six times a year, was promoted primarily through direct mail, using lists of people who buy cookbooks, cookware and certain types of mail order foods. The magazine deals solely with American food, reflecting Mr. Kimball's view that the U.S. is the most exciting place now for those interested in serious cooking.

CUISINE
Cuisine talks to Art Buchwald on food

Cuisine (with Art Buchwald on its October cover) is "coming out of the kitchen" by moving away from food preparation mechanics.

For the first two years, Mr. Kimball says, the emphasis was on improving the editorial product, not on attracting advertisers. The Cook's Magazine could afford to ignore advertising sales. The annual subscription price is $18, and Mr. Kimball says 85% of the revenue came from subscription sales. Nevertheless, advertising revenues have been increasing at a steady rate.

Some might say the magazine has done its best to hinder advertising sales, with policies even more stringent than Gourmet's. Besides rejecting ads for prepared foods, Cook's Magazine also refuses ads for cigarets. "Cigarets and food do not go together," says editor Ms. Goodbody. "Cigarets dull the palate."

In addition, the Cook's Magazine carries a cookware testing section in each issue where it evaluates equipment in "Consumer Reports" style. "We have lost advertising in the past [because of this section]," says Mr. Kimball. "But we feel it gives the magazine credibility."

The Cook's Magazine also is unconventional in its cover art. Rather than having tantalizing photographs of food to tempt people passing through the checkout counters or by newsstands, each cover is a watercolor of a basic food, like apples or peas. Mr. Kimball says that because the magazine is interested in the basics of food, its cover approach transmits that message faster than the photograph of a prepared dish. However, he admits, "You have to hold your breath when you put a magazine with a watercolor on the newsstand." He said Cook's Magazine now sells 30,000 of its 106,000 circulation on newsstands.

It was perhaps inevitable that another magazine with original art on its cover, The New Yorker, would be attracted to the Cook's Magazine. Mr. Kimball says he had been approached many times in the past about selling but was uninterested until he met with officials from The New Yorker. "They are an interesting group," he says. "They understand publishing in terms of putting out a quality magazine." Mr. Kimball says he was at a point where he had to raise more capital or else be satisfied with a much slower growth rate.

According to George Green, president of The New Yorker, Cook's Magazine appeared to complement nicely another recent purchase by the company, Horticulture. He says 12% of the people who subscribe to Cook's also have their own greenhouses. With The New Yorker behind it, Mr. Greene believes the magazine could increase its circulation to 200,000. "After that we'll see where it's going," he says. So far, both Mr. Green and Mr. Kimball agree The New Yorker connection has given Cook's new clout on Madison Avenue.

While the rest of the food magazines aim for narrow audiences, Bon Appetit has broadened its appeal. With 1.3 million circulation, it is 10 times the size of the Cook's Magazine and also is leader in total advertising revenue. For the first six months of 1983, Bon Appetit took in more than $9 million in ad revenues, a 14% increase over the $7.9 million recorded for the first six months of 1982.

Cleon T. (Bud) Knapp purchased Bon Appetit from the Pillsbury Co. in 1975. Mr. Phelps, who has been publisher since March, says that when Bon Appetit was owned by Pillsbury, clerks in his local supermarket used the magazine to keep the bottles from knocking together when packing groceries. "Bud Knapp had a vision of what that magazine could become," says Mr. Phelps. Mr. Knapp's timing was impeccable, and Bon Appetit, which continues to benefit from aggressive marketing, dominates the field.

Mr. Kimball

Cook's Magazine

Bon Appetit markets its name in two gourmet supermarkets in the San Francisco area. The supermarkets, located in downtown San Francisco and in posh suburban Tiburon, are a cooperative venture with the Safeway Stores chain. Mr. Phelps says the downtown store is profitable, while the Tiburon store is sometimes in the black. Safeway has concentrated on fine food products and hard-to-find ingredients. "The stores have one-quarter the room in soaps, but triple the space in wine vinegar," he says.

Bon Appetit recently completed a three-year study of its audience, which yielded a detailed profile of the food enthusiast. Bon Appetit had an 80% return on its survey—2,376 respondents. Of those answering, only 4% considered cooking a chore, while 86% said they cooked for fun, 84% identified themselves as creative cooks and 95% saw cooking as a form of self-expression.

Mr. Phelps and others in the epicurean field take comfort in these findings. "It's not a fad," says Food & Wine's Bill Rice. "People in this country are making their food and consuming it." If, as these publishers believe, the public's appetite for cooking information proves to be insatiable, then not only will these five magazines survive, but others may join the field.

"The long-range demographic data on this field of magazines is excellent," agrees Peter Diamandis, publisher of CBS's Woman's Day. "The interest level, the economics of the people who read these magazines, suggest it is a field with a rosy future." But, he cautions, "we have also seen people die of thirst in a rowboat."

According to Mr. Diamandis, it is important that each of these magazines carves out its own niche.

J. Kendrick Noble, a media analyst with Paine Webber Mitchell Hutchins, agrees: "Four or five magazines in this field is a high number unless each begins to develop a specialty," he says. "Otherwise, they're likely to come in conflict at some point."

Yet Mr. Noble does not believe the field is saturated. He pointed out that there are now more than 50 computer magazines, some of them covering just one computer, like the International Business Machines Personal Computer. He predicts the same type of specialization could occur in gourmet foods. "Wine alone could support a few specialty magazines," he says.

Bring on the bicarbonate

Poor Bill Rice. As editor of Food & Wine, he is constantly on the lookout for new restaurants that might be worth a mention in his magazine. Recently, he enjoyed a sumptuous lunch at an excellent restaurant in New York. He returned to his office thinking he would skip dinner, only to find that five dishes had just emerged from the test kitchen and were waiting for his approval. Bring on the bicarbonate.

Sometimes being editor of a food magazine can be too much of a good thing. Too much filet mignon. Too many pastries. Too much wine. But most of the time it is one of the best jobs in the world. "There's a lot of glamor," Mr. Rice admits.

"Just the other night I was at a reception at the Four Seasons. The luminaries were there—Beard, Claiborne."

Bill Rice: Hobnobbing with Beard and Claiborne.

Patricia Brown, editor of Cuisine, agrees. "It's really a wonderful job," she says. "It's marvelous when you dine in great restaurants. And the people involved in food are so wonderful and so much fun to deal with."

Mary Goodbody, editor of Cook's Magazine, will travel anywhere in the U.S. for a story. She went to Vermont to write an article on maple syrup, to Louisiana for a feature on oystering, to Missouri to investigate German cooking, to California to explore the current popularity of goat cheese and to Hawaii for a piece on macadamia nuts. The other editors all have done their share of traveling around the globe to keep up to date on happenings in the food world.

Yet all that travel can become tedious. Jane Montant, editor-in-chief of Gourmet, takes three four-week trips to Europe each year. "I detest airports," she says. "The whole thing of transportation has reached a point where you just grit your teeth and put up with it."

All the dining and drinking the job requires can take its toll on the waistline. "One thing I've done is increase my amount of exercise," says Marilou Vaughan, editor of Bon Appetit. "I run and do aerobics. And I've learned to say no. When I first came here and went to a tasting, I went in like they were the last desserts in the world."

Mr. Rice says that when he doesn't have an event to attend, he will go without a meal or grab a sandwich at his desk.

Ms. Brown also uses free lunch hours to cut back. "See that apple over there?" she asks a visitor.

"That's my lunch." After lunch, Ms. Brown planned to take part in an exercise class given in Cuisine's offices by an outside instructor.

Ms. Vaughn says she takes vacations that totally deemphasize food. "I found I can go to Hawaii, sit on a beach, eat fruit and forget about food," she says. —C.C.

'Tonight' need help? A few suggestions

"Don't," Merv Griffin once quipped, when asked how one should go about competing against NBC's Johnny Carson in a format even remotely like the "Tonight Show."

Mr. Griffin speaks from experience. His tv performing career was almost derailed when he went head to head against Mr. Carson for CBS in the late '60s. The results were so disastrous that CBS dumped the talk-show approach for movies and series reruns, and Mr. Griffin moved into syndication, where he has made millions.

Now the David facing television's late-night Goliath is Alan Thicke, who premiered last week in "Thicke of the Night" on more than 100 stations, including Mr. Carson's former Baltimore outlet, WMAR-TV.

It's too soon to assess the viewer or critical response to independent producer Fred Silverman's answer to "Tonight," but WMAR-TV executives are expecting great things of Mr. Thicke.

WMAR-TV doubled its ratings last summer after dumping Mr. Carson for reruns of "Soap." In the July Arbitron sweeps, WMAR-TV drew a 6 with "Soap" against Mr. Carson's 1 rating on an independent uhf station, WBFF-TV.

Heavily promoted on air and in listings ads, Mr. Thicke should be off to a good start in this market, WMAR-TV's bosses feel. They are so confident that they have priced the 30s on the barter series from MGM/UA, InterMedia and Metromedia at double what they were charging for "Tonight."

"Tonight" is not carried in Nashville anymore, and two middle-size markets, Milwaukee and Minneapolis, run the telecast on a delayed basis. During the summer the program has been neck and neck with CBS' dramatic fare in the national Nielsens.

Besides its minor clearance headaches, Mr. Carson's show also suffers from format arteriosclerosis and excessive doses of repeats. (NBC would not tell me what the repeat schedule is for '83-'84 when Joan Rivers will be the only host substitute, filling nine complete weeks. NBC sources could not say if there are to be more or less "Best of Carson" repeats; apparently the Carson people want to avoid straight answers on this point to keep us tuning in to find out for ourselves. On Mr. Thicke's opening night, the NBC competition was a rerun.)

I caught Mr. Carson's topical, satirical monologs a few times recently when he and his writers were hot. And happily, unlike his straitjacket format, the star himself, at 57, sparkles in a live and lively fashion during his finest moments. He is not going to be a pushover for anyone.

Currently Mr. Carson comes across as a man whose batteries have been recharged by a marriage breakup. He is making effective use of what the supermarket-distributed scandal sheets have to say about him and the pretty actresses he has been seen with since the split. He and Angie Dickinson, on her last visit to the show, stepped easily into the roles of a dating couple who were finding it slightly awkward to work together. Glowing and stimulated they looked, but not awkward.

"Tonight" grosses an estimated $100 million annually and remains one of NBC's most profitable and reliable shows. What can or should NBC and Mr. Carson do to protect their franchise with late-night audiences? Does the show need revitalizing for a fresher, more modern look?

"I like to see competition; it's good for everybody," said George Schlatter, executive producer of "Real People," who wishes Mr. Silverman well in his new production. "But I don't think the Carson show needs fixing. Johnny is one of the, if not the, most brilliant humorist working today. His talents are awesome."

Mr. Schlatter would encourage Mr. Carson to go right on doing his thing and to have a good time doing it. He applauds the comedian's guest list and his ability to listen to the headline guests attracted to the show. "Why, Johnny Carson could make me funny," said the veteran producer, who figures Mr. Thicke is not in the same league. Mr. Schlatter predicts Mr. Carson will become even more popular with folks of all ages when he returns to the nightclub circuit.

The "Real People" producer, who has been out traveling his own program, taping for the upcoming season, did have a few suggestions, however, for NBC and "Tonight." He would try "to get Johnny to do more shows and, say, give him a couple of affiliates if necessary to get him to work more" and Mr. Schlatter would stir up excitement for the audience and the star by touring the program once in a while. Then, finally, he would pour on more advertising dollars.

Two former NBC program execs, Paul Klein, president of the Playboy Cable Network, and Mike Dann, senior program advisor, ABC Video Enterprises, agreed that Fred de Cordova, Mr. Carson's longtime producer, doesn't need a show doctor. External changes for a program so dominated by one person would not be worth the time or effort, Mr. Dann told me. The program should, and doubtless will, run its course—every hit must come to an end sometime—in a fashion that is comfortable for the host.

Mr. Klein feels "Tonight" could be given a new look, starting right after the golf swing, just by taking out the couch and using skits instead of interviews, but he would not tamper with this hardy perennial until and unless it begins to suffer a sharp audience decline.

If his fans begin to desert him, then the network can ask the producers to come up with a different vehicle for their charismatic, wealthy star, assuming that Mr. Carson agrees to stay on the daily ratings treadmill when there are so many other beckoning places where he can perform without that pressure.#

Right decision given problems, observers say

New York—At a cost to Time Inc. of $47 million, TV-Cable Week might be the largest crash of a magazine launch. At five months, it is among the quickest. But industry reaction indicates the media giant made the right decision in pulling the plug now.

Its problems "seemed insurmountable," commented Eric Larson, publisher of rival TV Guide.

"Whether it was doomed to failure from the start is tough to say," said Neil Heller, president, TVSM, Jenkintown, Pa., a leading cable guide publisher. "I frankly think the concept had some merit, but it was just a question of a whole host of problems."

Primary among those was the resistance to the magazine by cable system operators who were to offer it to their subscribers. One observer feels there was a "resentment" over a Time Inc. "domi-

Time gives up on cable book

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

New York—Time Inc.'s decision to fold TV-Cable Week came as little surprise to those who had expected the tough, no-nonsense regime of president J. Richard Munro to decide the troubled magazine was risky business and put it out of its misery.

The announcement, following the company's regular monthly board meeting on Sept. 15 that the issue coming out this week will be the last, followed weeks of speculation in publishing and cable circles (AA, Sept. 5).

While the company originally refused to acknowledge a shutdown was being considered, the fact it was being discussed was in stark contrast to the rosy forecasts that prevailed when the communications giant announced 13 months ago it would commit $100 million in pretax funds to the launch of a broadcast and cable listings guide.

"The numbers were tough on this," publisher S. Christopher Meigher told Advertising Age. After considering various fixes that included monthly frequency, he said, "The decision to cease publishing became increasingly inescapable."

Since the company "misread demand for the magazine," Mr. Meigher said, "it wasn't hitting the targets we set for it. It's fairly prudent business

Cigaret tests 'farce'?

Barclay judge wants opinions

By RICHARD L. GORDON

Washington—The federal judge in the Barclay cigaret case is questioning the value of the Federal Trade Commission's cigaret rating program, suggesting that improving scientific knowledge about smoking may have rendered its method of measuring tar and nicotine "out of date," if not a "farce."

As the trial opened last week, attorneys for Brown & Williamson Tobacco, which has proposed that FTC scrap its numerical tar ratings in favor of grouping brands under "low," "medium" and "high" tar labels, told U.S. district court Judge Gerhard A. Gesell that "the evidence shows there is no system that is worth anything at all."

After originally awarding the B&W brand the coveted 1mg rating, FTC has been trying to take it back, going before Judge Gesell seeking temporary and permanent injunctions against the claim.

After opening with scientific experts, testimony is to resume today when consumer experts take the stand to debate how much trust and reliance smokers place in the FTC ratings and Barclay's 1mg tar/99% tar-free claim in particular.

Judge Gesell told FTC lawyers he de-

Aims to protect share; $20 million in ads

J&J rolls 2 hygiene items

By NANCY GIGES

Johnson & Johnson is making its first nationwide move to protect its leadership position in the $1 billion sanitary-napkin market since Procter & Gamble stirred up the category earlier this year with its testing of a line called Always.

J&J's Milltown, N.J.-based Personal Products Co. is rolling out two new products, Stayfree Silhouettes "body-shape" maxis and Assure "breathable" pantyliners.

The company said these items will receive unprecedented levels of advertising and promotion support in 1984, suggesting media budgets close to $20 million.

J&J holds over a 50% market share of the napkin market, with its No. 1-selling Stayfree maxi and minipads, plus Sure & Natural thin maxis and Carefree pantyshields.

A Personal Products spokeswoman said Silhouettes are shaped to fit the contours of a woman's body for greater comfort and have a patented "fluid distribution channel and unique stain-guard edge."

Assure, which earlier was the name of a superabsorbent tampon J&J tested and later dropped after the toxic shock syndrome scare, is described as containing a "unique backing material that allows air to flow through the pad to provide the wearer with comfortable dryness yet all the protection needed for light feminine wetness."

Lucrative promotional allowances are expected. For example, J&J is offering wholesalers off-invoice allowances of 30% during the introductory period if they buy all four items in the Assure line (scented and unscented liners in two different sizes). The offer drops to 25% if three items are purchased and 20% for two items.

In a somewhat unusual move, Silhouettes has been assigned to Compton Advertising, New York, even though Young & Rubicam handles regular Stayfree mini and maxipads. SSC&B handles Assure. It also worked on Assure tampon.

Assure was the target of a trademark infringement suit four years ago by P&G, which argued that the name would confuse consumers because of its own Sure antiperspirant, and furthermore that it sold a Sure tampon as well as an Assure shampoo and mouthwash. J&J prevailed, successfully refuting the

CBS 'media lab' studies tv's future

By SUSAN C. SPILLMAN

New York—CBS-TV is building an electronic "media laboratory" in Texas which the network expects will help it get a grasp on tv viewing habits of the future.

In conjunction with A.C. Nielsen Co., CBS is screening subscribers of CBS-owned Black Hawk Cable system in Hurst, Tex., between Dallas and Fort Worth, for participation in its project.

Next week, electronic monitoring meters will be installed in the homes of 125 who are selected, and CBS hopes to have results of some of its first research projections by the end of the year.

CBS, the only broadcast network to own a cable system, bought Black Hawk specifically for testing purposes last year after receiving a special waiver from the Federal Communications Commission. FCC rules bar broadcast networks from owning cable systems.

According to CBS vp-research Dave Poltrack, the initial questions the network will ask are how cable affects general viewing habits; to what extent viewers switch channels during commercials, and what type of program marketing is most effective.

In addition, CBS eventually expects to use the laboratory for advertising recall experiments; testing commercials and videotext research, Mr. Poltrack said.

The A.C. Nielsen Co. meters, which will cost less than $500,000 to install, will enable CBS to track which programs are being watched at any given moment.

Mr. Poltrack is particularly eager to learn how cable viewing patterns change over time, so the sample will include both veteran subscribers and those who get

GM planning 'image' cars

By JESSE SNYDER

Detroit—General Motors is planning to put the metal where its mouth is with 1986 or 1987 introductions of three specialty cars for Oldsmobile, Buick and Cadillac.

For years, GM executives have espoused creating more individuality and production autonomy among its five car-making divisions. In a six-day span this month, general managers of the three upscale lines outlined GM's long-range plans for image-leading cars that would build prestige for them like Corvette does for Chevrolet and the 1984 Fiero is expected to do for Pontiac.

The GM plan also would counter perception of the No. 1 car company as an "alphabet soup" manufacturer, a maker of mechanically identical "X," "J" and "A" car lines that differ mostly in front and rear treatment and upholstery.

Nets still tinkering as first shows bow

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—Tv's three earliest birds got the worm, but they've still got a long way to fly.

NBC's "We Got It Made," the earliest of the new-for-fall series to appear, as well as ABC's "Lottery" and "Matt Houston" (ABC's top freshman last season) accomplished their initial goal: Getting strong audience sampling.

But ad agency experts agreed that the next objective will be much more difficult: Holding those viewers opposite regular, first-run series once the prime time season begins in earnest on Sept. 26.

In the meantime, the beat goes on scheduling the new season. ABC, which weeks ago said its "Sunday Night Movie's" new season would begin on Oct. 2, last week finally decided on a major film, Paramount's "Heaven Can Wait."

Also for that night, NBC now has decided to follow a two-hour "Knight Rider" return episode with a "Yellow Rose" series preview at 10 p.m. (ET), instead of the initially planned "TV's Censored Bloopers" special. ("Yellow Rose" normally will air on Saturdays at 10 p.m.)

The premiere of ABC's "Love Boat" on Oct. 1 will be in the form of a two-hour special built around a cruise to Mainland China, thereby delaying "Fantasy Island's" return by a week. In earlier announcements for that evening, CBS slot-

Buick shifts its sights

By RALPH GRAY

Orchard Lake, Mich.—Buick still is asking "Wouldn't you really rather have a Buick?" but to a different audience—those who aren't ready to buy.

A key test of the strategy will come next spring, for the new front-wheel-drive Electra Park Avenue. The goal is to double Electra sales from about 72,000 units in model 1983.

"There aren't enough traditional Buick buyers to meet those sales. We have to get new buyers," John Dabels, general director of marketing, told the press here.

Armed with research, Buick is trying to get its cars higher on the shopping list of those who prefer vacations and education to new wheels.

"We're trying to get information to people much earlier in their decision-making process," said general manager Lloyd Reuss.

"What we're trying to do now is work harder on going up front—before a person makes a decision on how he's going to spend that discretionary income."

"It's not just Buick against Oldsmobile or Buick against imports, it's Buick against new furniture," Mr. Dabels said.

"We're trying to find out how to change the perceived value of the car in relation to other items in the consideration set for consumers' discretionary income," he said.

"We have a clue that it's extremely difficult because of the commitment of people to vacations and education. We have tested the new Electra to see if they are willing to change. It suggests new-car merchandising tie-ins. If vacations are important, how can we make the car part of the vacation mindset?" he said.

Buick is also trying to reach those who can't afford a Buick—yet. The General Motors division is seeking to predispose potential buyers to its products. It's doing that through Riviera convertibles.

McCann-Erickson is the agency.#

Jergens lets out a Squeek!

Cincinnati—Andrew Jergens Co. will move Squeek! shampoo and conditioner into national distribution this fall.

The two lines will be shipped nationally at the end of this month, according to Robert G. (Guy) Chandler, exec vp-domestic operations.

The company says it will spend $9.2 million in media advertising to support the introduction.

Squeek! has been testing for more than a year (AA, Feb. 15, '82). Controlled store tests in Topeka and Erie were followed by full market tests in Phoenix and Louisville. Extensive couponing and 39¢ trial sizes were used in the tests.

Preventing oily hair is the primary positioning of the new product, which would put it in competition with such brands as S.C. Johnson & Son's Agree.

Advertising uses the sound of a violin squeaking while visuals show hands running through the hair. Animated "squeeks" are shown emanating from the hair.

Prime time, daytime and fringe time tv commercials will be used to launch the brand, Mr. Chandler said. Magazine ads in women's books break in December issues.

The Times laps the field, say journalism profs

By Robert G. Goldsborough

The New York Times is by miles the best daily newspaper in the United States.

So say the more than five score of college and university teachers who responded to Advertising Age Magazine's survey to determine what journalism educators think are American's finest dailies.

In all, 110 faculty members from schools in 39 states returned questionnaires listing their choices and responding to questions about the current state and the future of daily newspapers, particularly those serving metropolitan areas. (In a corollary but less extensive survey, Advertising Age Magazine also polled advertising agency media department executives and buyers, who also slotted the Times No. 1. Results are in an accompanying story on Page M-5.)

The survey of journalism faculty members came up with these general conclusions:

- Large morning dailies are the best papers in the country.
- What sets the best papers apart is first-rate writing, aggressive and original reporting, a strong editorial voice, strong local coverage and a commitment to excellence on the part of management.
- Most major cities eventually will have only one metropolitan daily, with morning papers in a far stronger position to survive than evening papers.
- To compete with suburban and outlying papers, metro dailies must do more zoning, put out stronger suburban sections and beef up the "total market coverage" concept.
- Papers need to place more emphasis on reporting and analyzing the news and less on features, games, puzzles and other "froth," as one respondent referred to feature material.

The teachers were particularly outspoken on the last item, scolding American papers generally for having too many features at the expense of news. One went so far as to advise papers to "throw out old things—comics, advice columns, things that don't work for readers anymore."

The charge of frivolity was not leveled at the New York Times, though, which was praised for the seriousness and thoroughness of its coverage.

The Times so dominated our poll that it received 67 of the 101 first-place votes cast and was mentioned on all but two of the ballots. The Wall Street Journal received the next-highest number of first-place votes, 15, but finished only fourth over-all because of the weighted scoring system (10 points for first, 9 for second, and on down).

Our respondents basically agreed on the top four papers—the Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times and Journal, in that order. A sharp dropoff followed, with the next six papers closely bunched. The fifth-place paper, the Boston Globe, had only half as many points as the No. 4 Journal.

In all, 84 papers were mentioned in the returned questionnaires, the large majority of which were big-city dailies. Geographic biases were almost nonexistent, though. In our tabulations, we also divided the country into ADVERTISING AGE'S four circulation zones—East, Midwest, South and Far West. The New York Times easily finished first in all four, while the Washington Post was second in three zones and the Los Angeles Times was No. 2 in the Far West. The Boston Globe also had its strongest showing among Far West ballots, and the Miami Herald did not do particularly well in the South.

Among nonmetropolitan papers cited were the Troy (O.) Daily News, Berkshire (Pittsfield, Mass.) Eagle, Quincy (Mass.) Patriot-Ledger, Burlington (Ia.) Hawk Eye, Fairbanks (Alaska) News-Miner, Waukesha (Wis.) Freeman, Bangor (Me.) News, Vancouver (Wash.) Columbian and Eugene (Ore.) Register-Guard. The 65,000-circulation Register-Guard (see story on Page M-44 in today's special report on Newspapers) was mentioned more often than any other nonmetropolitan newspaper, including on questionnaires from such widely separated places as Indiana, Louisiana and Ohio.

Among "medium-size" papers, Little Rock's Arkansas Gazette (circulation 129,000 daily) was singled out for excellence by several professors, both in their rankings and in the open-ended questions.

The top 10 papers shared at least two key characteristics—a morning printing cycle and healthy circulation patterns. Every one of the 10 is essentially a morning paper, including the two national publications, the Journal and Christian Science Monitor. The Boston Globe and Chicago Tribune are officially termed "all day," but each originally was an a.m. paper and both still maintain by far their greatest strenghth in the morning.

Eight of our top 10 have Sunday editions (excepting the Journal and Monitor), and all eight have shown circulation gains in Audit Bureau of Circulations (ABC) figures in the last year, ranging from 2.6% for the Louisville Courier-Journal and New York Times to 14% for the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Our final results were similar to those in a recent survey of publishers, editors

How we took our poll

In May, Advertising Age Magazine sent questionnaires and prepaid return envelopes to 350 college and university journalism faculty members in all 50 states and the District of Columbia.

Their names were taken from the directory of the Assn. for Education in Journalism. Most faculty chosen were in their schools' newspaper or news-editorial sequences, although some questionnaires also were sent to professors and instructors of advertising.

At larger schools, several faculty members (usually including the dean or department head) were polled; however, about 20% of the questionnaires were sent to faculty members at smaller schools that have only one or two persons teaching journalism.

We received 110 completed questionnaires—a return rate of 31%. Not all the respondents ranked their selections, choosing only to give us an unranked "top 10" or "top 5." Their listings were not tabulated in our final standings.

The questionnaire asked respondents to list the 10 best daily newspapers in the U.S. The criteria, we said, should include "local news coverage; national and foreign news coverage; over-all writing quality throughout the paper; quality of editorials; sports coverage; business coverage; quality of features and special sections; competitiveness; layout and design (including the use of photography, color and graphics), and leadership and innovation in the newspaper field."

We also asked these open-ended questions:

- Do you have any general or specific observations as to what makes one or all of these newspapers (the ones you chose) superior?
- How do you feel about the future of the metropolitan daily newspaper, particularly vis-a-vis the growing number of suburban and regional dailies? And how might metropolitan dailies—particularly papers not on your list—improve themselves to better serve their readers?

About 80% of those responding also gave answers to these questions.

We also made a less-extensive survey of media buyers and media department heads at a number of the larger U.S. advertising agencies, mailing them the same questionnaire, but adding "effectiveness as an advertising vehicle" to the list of criteria. Of 45 surveys sent out, we received 16, a return of 35%. —R.G.G.

and journalism teachers conducted by Michael Emery, journalism historian and director of the Media Research Institute, California State University, Northridge. Mr. Emery, who received 610 responses from a mailing of more than 3,000, found his ranking to be New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune and Christian Science Monitor. These six were followed, "in no particular order," by the Philadelphia Inquirer, Boston Globe and Miami Herald. (Detailed results of Mr. Emery's study will be contained in the 1984 edition of his journalism textbook, "The Press and America," and also is available in a monograph titled "America's Leading Daily Newspapers," published by News & Features Press, Indianapolis, Ind. 46220).

Over-all, we were pleased by the positive reaction to our poll. There were some naysayers, however. One Idaho professor returned a blank questionnaire, saying that such rankings are, "at best, an exercise in sophism." A Montana professor likewise sent back a blank ballot, saying: "Such lists are invalid. How can I possibly pick the top 10 dailies when I do not read all of the 1,730 dailies in the United States?"

A more constructive comment came from a Virginia journalism faculty member, who was concerned that we would get only large papers in our top 10 (which was basically true). He suggested we take state-by-state polls in three categories: Metro dailies, smaller dailies and weeklies. An ambitious project, but one worth consideration.

Then there was the New Mexico professor who bristled at this statement in our cover letter: "We are going to journalism educators because we feel that as a group you are the most knowledgeable about the relative merits of papers across the country."

His reply: "I would say this is sheer nonsense! Most journalism educators know as little about newspapering as newspaper publishers." Having thus vented himself, he filled out the questionnaire and returned it.

Following are the top 10 from our survey, with their most recent circulations (ABC six-month figures ending March 31, 1983).

1 New York Times (daily 963,443; Sunday, 1,563,531). When we first contemplated this survey, we fully expected the Times to be its over-all winner, but we were surprised by the size of its victory margin. In addition to getting two-thirds of the first-place votes, it was listed in the top 10 of all but a handful of ballots, piling up a total of 908 points, far outdistancing the No. 2 Washington Post.

The Times seems to have attained "unknockable" status with the journalism professors. They praised it as "the best of our daily newspapers because of the thoroughness of its coverage," as "our only newspaper of record" and for "high standards of coverage." The only criticisms—and they were slight—were in the area of makeup and design.

Times circulation in the last year jumped 16,000 daily (1.7%) and 39,000 Sunday (2.6%). About one-third of the paper's Sunday circulation and one-fourth of its daily circulation are outside the New York metropolitan area.

2 Washington Post (daily, 747,676; Sunday, 1,005,468). If the New York Times is the "unknockable" of the newspaper world, perhaps the Post is its Notre Dame football team or New York Yankees—you love 'em or hate 'em. Actually, there was more of the former from our respondents: The Post got by far the greatest number of second-place votes, 29, and also led in third-place mentions, with 30. Positive comments touched on the strength and thoroughness of the paper's over-all coverage and its potential (along with the Times) to become a truly national voice.

But there was a flip side. The paper's highly publicized and controversial recent history—beginning with Watergate and its attendant hoopla and continuing through the Janet Cooke episode and the gaffe in which a Post column erroneously charged the Carter administration had bugged the Blair House when the Reagans were living there before moving into the White House—has made the Post something of a target. One faculty member, who ranked the paper sixth, said he faulted it for "arrogance." Another, slotting it No. 10, added, "better if it had a good editor," an apparent reference to the Post's outspoken executive editor, Benjamin Bradlee.

The Post, which dominates its market like few other metropolitan papers, saw daily circulation slip slightly in the last ABC audit, although Sunday sales zoomed by 20,000, cracking the million mark.

3 Los Angeles Times (daily, 1,060,588; Sunday, 1,342,720). The West's best paper was our solid No. 3 finisher. Few respondents had specific comments about the Times, though, other than to praise its over-all quality and its strength as a great regional paper. Not surprisingly, it drew its greatest support from faculty members at western colleges and universities, who cumulatively ranked it No. 2, while it finished third in the South and Midwest, fourth in the East. But one of the Times' two first-place votes came from a teacher in Indiana, who called it "far superior to the others." Daily, the Times slipped some 2,000 in circulation in the most-recent audit, but its Sunday numbers jumped by an impressive 25,000.

4 Wall Street Journal (daily, 2,036,789). In designing our questionnaire, we purposely omitted any mention of the Journal, the Christian Science Monitor and USA Today, not wanting to prejudice respondents in one direction or another. We wanted them to rate these national papers as they saw fit, giving whatever weight they chose to our various criteria.

The result was that the Journal finished second in number of first-place votes with 15 but was left off many lists altogether by faculty members who wrote they liked the paper but felt it didn't fully qualify. Indeed, America's best-selling daily does not contain several of the elements we listed as criteria—sports sec-

Media buyer rankings

In our minipoll of agency media executives and buyers, we received 16 responses out of 45 sent out. The questionnaire was identical to that received by journalism professors except for the addition of one criterion—"effectiveness as an advertising vehicle." The ranking was similar to that of the faculty members in that the New York Times ran away with the race, getting all 16 first-place votes (even though the respondents were fairly evenly drawn from agencies in the East, Midwest and West Coast). The Washington Post and Los Angeles Times finished second and third, as in our larger poll, but the Chicago Tribune, sixth among journalism educators, was ranked No. 4 by the media executives. A cure for Fleet St. fatigue?

By Sean Milmo

United Kingdom

News of the business of newspapers seems to be the order of the day. And when that news is good, you can hear the cheers through the din of the rolling presses.

For the national newspapers of the United Kingdom, those cheers could be heard quite clearly, thank you, when it was announced that the common stock of Reuters, the news and financial information service company, would be floated for the first time on the London and New York Stock Exchanges early next year.

The national newspapers, you see, own 41% of Reuters, whose value has risen to $1.5 billion as a result of the phenomenal success of its computerized business data enterprise. The rest of Reuters' shares are held by the U.K.'s provincial newspapers and Australian and New Zealand publishers.

As one newspaper owner puts it: "It was as if we had discovered oil at the bottom of the garden."

For instance, Rupert Murdoch's News International, owner of four national papers, including the Times of London, could pocket as much as $150 million as a result of the shares sale; Associated Newspapers, with the largest share, 12.2%, stands to gain $180 million.

Alas, there is still some bad news in the business of these newspapers, which are based on or around London's Fleet St. Many pundits expect that the windfall—this oil at the bottom of the garden—will make little difference to the struggles Fleet Street has had over the past two or three decades in making money.

Extra reserves of cash will do little, in particular, to sort out the chronic industrial relations difficulties that have dogged the national press since before the last war.

"If lack of money were the cause of its labor troubles, Fleet Street would have solved them long ago because it's never been exactly short of cash," says Conon Fahy, an analyst at Teather & Greenwood, London. "The Reuters deal is in that respect irrelevant."

The shares' deal could even make matters worse, says Harold Lind, an economist specializing in the media. "It will take the pressure off them to do something," Mr. Lind says. "Once they've spent the money their difficulties will return in an even more critical form."

The lastest crippling industrial dispute closed the Financial Times for 10 weeks in July and August, costing its owner, Pearson Longman, $15 million. The dispute centered on differences among groups of workers running the printing machines.

Over the years, the power of the unions on Fleet Street has prevented the newspaper owners from attempting to reduce staff costs by introducing new technology. A move to cut labor at the Sunday Times and the Times, for instance, led to the papers' closure for nine months four years ago.

In July, the Times had to suspend a multi-million-dollar tv advertising campaign because the management was unable to reach agreement with the unions to produce more copies to meet the expected increase in sales.

"But for the chronic overmanning, national newspapers would be a highly profitable business," says Mr. Lind. Two years ago Fleet Street made $12 million in profit on revenues of $4.5 billion.

The Reuters shares, in view of the situation, could enable the publishers to set up printing centers away from Fleet Street or produce regional editions via satellite. But such is the strength of the print unions that they would still have a grip on the printing and distribution.

Some owners may use the money instead to diversify into cable tv and other media. "But most are likely to put it in the bank to save for a rainy day," says Peter Clarke, secretary-general of the U.K. Market Research Society and an expert on trends in the newspaper industry.

Or, as one analyst says: "Anyone sensible would take the cash and get the hell out of the place. But owning a Fleet Street newspaper has too many kudos. For any tycoon it's far more exciting than making baked beans or biscuits. Besides it brings knighthoods and regular visits to Downing Street [home of the Prime Minister]."

The last proprietor to be raised to the peerage was Lord Matthews, head of Fleet Holdings Ltd., owner of the Daily Express and Daily Star. Formerly a surveyor, he helped create the Trafalgar Construction and shipping group before moving into Fleet Street in the mid-1970s.

Besides the prestige, an-

Top 30 national ad performers in 1982

Once again, Newsday, the Times Mirror Co. of Long Island, N.Y., showed it knows how to get its share of national advertising.

As it did in 1981, Newsday ranked as the No. 1 performer in obtaining general and automotive national ads in 1982, according to figures compiled by Media Records. The paper, in fact, outdistanced the rest of the pack by a considerable margin.

Listed on this page are the top 30 performers for'1982, as determined by Media Records. Each entry contains the following information:

- A performance index noted below the paper's name. The index was determined by adding the paper's increase in national ad pages from 1981 to 1982 with the percentage of that increase. The sum was then compared with the performance of the 134 newspapers Media Records studied. For instance, Newsday registered an increase of 546 ad pages, representing a 9.34% increase. The sum of 546 and 9.34 is 555.34. The average for all 134 newspapers was 35 plus 1.72, or 36.72. Newsday's 555.34 was then divided by 36.72% to arrive at a performance index of 1,512.4
- Number of national ad pages recorded in 1982.
- Gain in national ad pages, 1982 vs. 1981.
- Percentage gain in national ad pages, 1981 vs. 1980, rounded off to the nearest tenth of a percentage point.
- The newspaper's daily and Sunday circulations, according to Audit Bureau of Circulations' FAS-FAX report for the six-month period ending March 31, 1983 (or, if not available, the newspaper's own figures were used).
- Percentage gain in circulation, as compared with the year-earlier figure.
- The paper's publication frequency.
- The paper's ownership.
- The location of the paper's advertising and main editorial offices.

The Top Ten

tion, feature sections, photography, color graphics, local news coverage. But this didn't deter the majority of our contributors; 70% of them listed the Journal in their top 10.

The most often mentioned strength of the paper was the high quality of its writing. Some sample comments: "Over-all it contains the freshest news, presented engagingly for literate readers"; "the Journal makes the list because its major news stories are so well written" and "its writing makes up for its lack of graphics."

"Metro dailies could insure success by emulating Gene Roberts of the Inquirer by broadening their definition of significant news, building intelligent, aggressive staffs. . . ."

5 Boston Globe (daily, 507,791; Sunday, 778,876). The Globe finished first among the six papers tightly bunched between sixth and 10th place in our balloting, barely edging the Chicago Tribune. Interestingly, the Globe was stronger in the Far West, where teachers placed it fifth, than its "home precincts," the East, where it finished sixth.

A survivor of the rough-and-tumble competition in a city once known for its large number of daily papers, the Globe steadily has risen into the ranks of the country's most respected papers, evidenced in part by its numerous recent Pulitzers and other prizes. Today the Globe's principal competitor is the city's only other remaining metro daily, the struggling, Murdoch-owned Herald (formerly Herald-American); the Globe holds a 2-to-1 circulation lead daily and more than 3-to-1 on Sunday.

6 Chicago Tribune (daily, 756,877; Sunday, 1,127,778). Like the Globe, the Tribune has enjoyed a growing reputation in recent years. The reactionary and isolationist Republicanism that permeated the paper during the long reign of its legendary publisher, Col. Robert R. McCormick (who died in 1955), has been replaced by a more moderate editorial policy. But beyond that, the Tribune has steadily improved its coverage, streamlined its design and vastly upgraded its feature sections. Again like the Globe, it also has scored well in recent Pulitzer competitions. But unlike the Globe and most of the other top 10 papers, the Tribune finds itself locked in a fierce competitive battle on its home turf. The opponent: The feisty Sun-Times, which finished 18th in our survey and which continues to make inroads on the Tribune's longtime circulation and advertising dominance.

In our survey, the Tribune was cited for being a newspaper that takes naturally to its role as a strong regional daily and also was singled out for strong graphics. One critic, however, said, "I would not put the Tribune on the list because it tends to pass up too much local news, except politics and crime. For the size of the staff it has, it's not as good as it should be."

7 Miami Herald (daily, 443,223; Sunday, 533,539). Long considered by many to be the strongest newspaper in the South, the Herald got particularly high marks from respondents for its renowned Latin American reporting, although it also was cited on several ballots for good over-all coverage. One of the two who gave it a first-place vote was a midwesterner, who said, "I have ranked the Herald first on the grounds that it covers its circulation area better—more completely, aggressively and imaginatively—than just about any other metro paper."

The Herald may be a prophet without honor, however. While it finished seventh in ballots from both the East and Midwest, it was only 11th on questionnaires received from the South, behind the neighboring St. Petersburg Times, which placed ninth on southern ballots and 12th over-all.

8 Philadelphia Inquirer (daily, 544,777; Sunday, 1,036,717). Judging from our ballots, the Inquirer would seem to merit the title as most-improved major U.S. daily in recent years. One said, "The Inquirer is especially noteworthy for its degree of improvement in a decade or less." From another: "Metropolitan dailies could insure their survival by emulating Gene Roberts of the Inquirer [by] broadening their definition of significant news, building intelligent, aggressive staffs and then spending the money to provide quality coverage."

Indeed, Mr. Roberts has built the Inquirer into a formidable presence during his tenure as executive editor. It has gotten wide praise for its over-all reporting and writing, and its coverage of the Three Mile Island nuclear debacle was a journalistic tour de force.

Inquirer circulation took a big jump last year, helped greatly by the death of the Philadelphia Bulletin. The daily increase was more than 15%, with Sunday sales up 14%.

9 Louisville Courier-Journal (daily, 181,245; Sunday, 333,232). For decades, the Courier-Journal has made top 10 lists compiled by various sources (see accompanying story), and our respondents continue to agree. Located in a medium-size regional city, the Courier has consistently proven itself to have national stature.

Like many papers in shrinking cities, however—Louisville proper suffered a 28% population drop from 1970 to 1980—the Courier-Journal fights a constant numbers battle.

Last year it held almost even in daily sales, losing more than 1,000, while Sunday circulation was up 8,600—a gain of more than 2.5%.

10 Christian Science Monitor (daily, 149,913). Recent times have not treated the stately Monitor kindly. Circulation plummeted from about 200,000 to 150,000 in only a decade, and the Boston-based national daily, now downsized to a tabloid, has undergone stringent economies.

However, our survey shows respect for the paper's quality remains high. It was in the top 10 in about 30% of our responses, and the one teacher who listed it No. 1 said he did so "not for flossy extras such as the bigger papers can afford, but because it's the only paper (in my opinion) that offers a truly objective, impartial approach.

"In an era of advocacy journalism, it is the only paper that gives both sides of an issue in a fair manner."

Katherine Fanning of the Christian Science Monitor: Her avowed goal of revitalizing the paper is one of the toughest challenges facing an American journalist today.

The Monitor's new editor, Katherine Fanning, comes from the Anchorage Daily News, where circulation grew fourfold during her tenure as publisher. Her avowed goal at the Monitor is to revitalize the church-based paper founded by Mary Baker Eddy in 1908. It is a noble charge, but also one of the toughest challenges facing an American journalist today.

'Most talked-about' paper

Not only did Gannett Co.'s year-old national daily, USA Today, finish a respectable 13th in our poll, it also was the most frequently mentioned paper in the survey's open-ended questions. A sampling of comments:

- "USA Today is setting trends which are bound to be and already are being copied by much of its opposition. Although it has been widely criticized and highly feared, it is a tremendously readable newspaper and represents what I think many of the better newspapers of the future will look like." (Claude Sumerlin, Henderson State University, Arkadelphia, Ark.)
- "USA Today, with its emphasis on concise reporting, color and graphics, does well what it has set out to do." (Donald F. Brod, Northern Illinois University, De Kalb)
- "USA Today should be cited for layout and design, innovations and sports. Otherwise, to me—it's very thin." (Mary A. Gardner, Michigan State University, East Lansing)
- "Stories are maddeningly short, but makeup is attractive and things like the weather map and the focus-on-one-issue editorial page are very good." (E.A. Nickerson, University of Delaware, Newark)
- "The afternoon papers have to compete with suburban afternoons, as well as television, and are hurt, I believe, by the three national papers, especially USA Today." (Edwin R. Bayley, dean, graduate school of journalism, University of California, Berkeley)

Other polls, other years

Ranking U.S. daily newspapers has been a popular sport for years. Whatever else it proves, it makes interesting reading and stimulates discussion about the state of the press.

Time did "Top 10" articles in 1964 and 1974 based on opinions of its editors and correspondents (see accompanying chart), and Edward L. Bernays, a Boston public relations man, polled more than 100 publishers in 1970. Mr. Bernays' poll listed the New York Times on top, with mentions on more than 60% of the ballots. After the Times came the following papers: Los Angeles Times (50% or more); Louisville Courier-Journal, St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Washington Post (40% or more); Christian Science Monitor, Milwaukee Journal and Miami Herald (30% or more), and Chicago Tribune and Wall Street Journal (20% or more).

During the last year, Michael Emery, a journalism historian and director of the Media Research Institute at California State University, Northridge, polled publishers, editors and educators, receiving some 600 responses. The top papers in Mr. Emery's study also are listed in the chart.

Few new series expected to survive—Page 87

CBS gets nod in close race

By COLBY COATES

'83 - '84 SEASON

As the 1983-84 network tv prime time season kicks off, most of the obvious signs point to a fifth consecutive CBS victory in household ratings.

But if you're looking for some action, take ABC and the points generated by the World Series, a full season of prime time professional football and the ratings momentum of 43½ hours of prime time coverage of the 1984 Winter Olympics.

Understand that ABC could leave its backers twisting in the wind; it has regular series problems that are possibly too severe for its "big play" programing to overcome.

Moreover, third-place NBC continues to draw a bead on ABC's traditional areas of strength—young, urban and upscale viewers.

But with ABC and NBC continually butting heads, CBS' reliance on older, more rural audiences should power it to yet another finish atop the prime time ratings.

The notion of ABC pulling a surprise is not without substantiation.

"If it's a close race, say a half ratings point difference between CBS' and ABC's regular series, those three sports elements could do it for ABC," said Steve Leff, senior vp, Backer & Spielvogel.

However, he hastened to add, "CBS finished last season pulling away from ABC," and "if NBC makes gains, it will primarily be at ABC's expense."

Mr. Leff sees a CBS win.

Paul Schulman, president of the Paul Schulman Co., a Gardner Advertising subsidiary, says projected ratings of only regular series give CBS the

Ralston to budget for opportunity print buys

By JANET NEIMAN

Ralston Purina is instituting a contingency budget for opportunistic magazine buys, and is increasing its print ad budget 50% for the next fiscal year.

The program is designed to take advantage of discounted rates on remnant pages and copy split partnership. Remnant pages are those unfilled by editorial copy or ads, or those left when ads are pulled at the last minute. Copy splits refer to ads run only in some regions of multiregional publications, for which "partner" advertisers must be found to run in the remaining regions. The initiator of the split pays a premium for the ad, while the "partner" does not.

The boost in print spending is occurring partially in conjunction with this new program, according to William Claggett, division vp-director of advertising and marketing services. In calendar 1982, St. Louis-based Ralston spent about $9 million in magazine advertising and about $2.5 million in newspapers.

While most advertisers buy remnant space at a discounted rate to some degree, Ralston has provided to magazines, in advance, "broad parameters" indicating the regions, issue dates and space size for which it would have ads available. The

GOT PLAQUE?
FIGHT BACK.

What is plaque?

You may not know it, but you could have plaque. Almost everybody does. Plaque is a sticky, nearly invisible germ film that forms and builds up on your teeth. But, if you reduce plaque, you can have a cleaner, fresher mouth with less stain and odor.

How does Listerine® fight plaque?

You know Listerine kills the germs that can cause bad breath. Now recent tests prove that it also kills the germs that can cause plaque buildup.

Reduce plaque buildup by up to 50%.

Clinical evidence shows that with a professional cleaning, regular brushing, and rinsing with Listerine twice a day, you can reduce plaque buildup by up to 50% for a cleaner mouth. And that means better oral hygiene.

Make it part of your daily oral hygiene.

So, to reduce plaque, brush thoroughly—at least twice a day is recommended. Floss to remove food particles and plaque between teeth. See your dentist for cleanings and checkups at least twice a year. And use Listerine Antiseptic regularly, twice a day, for better oral hygiene.

Listerine. Helps reduce plaque for better oral hygiene.

Big plaque attack

Listerine ads saying it helps fight plaque have drawn government scrutiny. Print ads are set to break in November magazines. (See story on Page 81.)

$120 million in billings to Y&R

Conflict policy key in big Colgate shift

By NANCY GIGES

New York—In a dramatic twist of the account conflict noose that hangs over multinational ad agencies, Young & Rubicam last week dropped Procter & Gamble, a strict conflict policy enforcer, in order to serve the more flexible P&G rival, Colgate-Palmolive.

To give Y&R $120 million in business worldwide, Colgate engineered perhaps the most sweeping agency realignment in history by dropping Kenyon & Eckhardt in the U.S. and D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius overseas.

The $60 million worth of Procter & Gamble advertising assignments overseas resigned by Y&R remains unassigned.

Just three months ago, Y&R and P&G terminated their relationship in the U.S. and several other countries (AA, June 20). At that point, P&G, a Y&R client since 1949, took $13 million worth of U.S. business from Y&R because the agency was handling the national introduction of Richardson-Vicks' Olay beauty soap. P&G cited "competitive conflict considerations" in splitting with Y&R over Olay.

The P&G policy holds that a conflict exists when an agency handles any product anywhere that might compete with any brand in the P&G division for which the agency works. Olay competes with products in the same P&G division that Y&R handled—bar soaps and household cleaners. Colgate, on the other hand, is more flexible. As a Colgate executive explained it last week, "When there's a real conflict, we have a real problem. But we choose not to dream up a conflict when one doesn't exist." And so Colgate felt free enough to include its Irish Spring bar soap in the account package going to Y&R.

Colgate sees Olay as a cosmetic soap while Irish Spring is a deodorant soap, hence no conflict. Colgate "prefers to consider each situation individually and evaluate it on its own merits," the executive said.

The Colgate action, apart from what it says about account conflict policies, also appears to be the concluding act in a worldwide

Snuggle targets Downy

By NANCY GIGES

New York—Lever Bros. is moving its Snuggle fabric softener into 17% of the country, supported by advertising spending at a national level of $20 million—an effort to top Procter & Gamble's ad investment in market leader Downy.

Although Lever officials won't admit it publicly, sources report the company has been surprised by the success of the brand (AA, July 4). It has not only captured 25% of the liquid fabric softener market in its Milwaukee test market, but also expanded the category by 11%.

One gauge of how unusual this success is for Lever is the way company executives agonized over the question of whether they would be helping the competition if they went public with word about Snuggle's early success.

Last week, the "go public" advocates won, and the traditionally aloof Lever people took the rare step of talking about marketing plans.

A bear named Snuggle is central to the fabric softener's ad drive.

Introduced into test a year ago, the brand is positioned as offering softness comparable to the leading brand but at a lower price.

The concept originated some five years ago with the Unilever subsidiary in France, where the product is called Cajoline (meaning cuddly); an anthropomorphic teddy bear appears in the commercials. After success there, it later was expanded with similar results into other European markets.

When it was brought to the attention of the U.S. Lever group, marketing executives were interested, "but we thought we could improve upon the concept," said John Speirs, marketing manager.

Basically, the difference here is in the bear's form and personality. The U.S. bear, named Snuggle, was created for Lever by Kermit Love, a designer of sets, costumes and puppets whose work includes Big Bird and other Sesame Street characters.

Lorimar will enter sports syndication

By CRAIG REISS

NEW YORK—Petry Sports has dropped its commitment to the $18 million broadcast rights to the Southeastern Conference college basketball games. Waiting to pick up Petry's share is Lorimar Productions, the Hollywood production company that bought Kenyon & Eckhardt last March.

If the deal between Lorimar and Sports Productions Inc., which is the actual rights holder to the SEC games, is concluded this week as expected, it will mark Lorimar's entry into sports syndication.

The move is seen as both a means for Lorimar to expand its enterprises to include the sports programing field and as a strategic step to allow Lorimar to participate in future bids for college football tv rights if the U.S. Supreme Court upholds a lower court decision nullifying existing contracts between the National Collegiate Athletic Assn. and the tv networks.

Russ Potts, president of SPI, said, "It was an amicable parting with Petry. It's not a perfect fit for them. But we are trying to position ourselves for the football rights, and we needed to bring in a financial partner to help us prepare."

That financial clout now is expected to come from Lorimar. Mr. Potts said SPI and Lorimar had "an agreement to agree," but added no contracts had been signed. Lee Rich, president of Lorimar, said discussions with SPI are continuing, but no decision has been made.

The strategy behind the SPI-Lorimar team-

Seagram puts brand on imported vodka

By GAY JERVEY

NEW YORK—Seagram—a name more closely associated with Canada than any other foreign land—will bring forth an imported vodka with a decidedly unforeign name and price.

Soon to arrive from the Canadian north country, Seagram's imported vodka will carry a less expensive price tag than has been the category's fashion—circa $6.50 to $7 for a fifth of 80 proof, versus the more elitist price of $11 to $12.50 commanded by such brands as Stolichnaya, Absolut and Finlandia. As such, Seagram Distillers' entry will be competitively priced with Heublein's Smirnoff, which widely is credited with creating vodka's popularity here during the 1970s.

Seagram's newest spirit initially will be available in New Jersey, St. Louis and Denver markets.

The company refuses to disclose the marketing budget, terming it "significant." For their part, the product's distributors seem particularly bullish on the brand and the distilling giant's substantial marketing plans, involving magazine, outdoor and newspaper ads, not to mention a barrage of point-of-purchase and other collateral material the company will provide.

Full-color print ads by Warwick Advertising, based here, will position the brand as an affordable alternative. "Seagram introduces the imported vodka without the imported price," declares the headline.

Copy goes on to elaborate on the brand's "smooth, velvety" taste, easily identifiable as imported, and calls other imports' prices "often too high."

Seagram's intentions are clear: To cash in not only on its ubiquitous brand name, but also the snowballing popularity of imported vodkas which, until now, have proved too rich for the blood of many who would love to try.

Over the past few years, vodka imports have looked richly alive and adolescent in an otherwise maturing and stagnant market. According to Market Watch, published by M. Shanken Communications, New York, total imported vodka sales, monitored by case depletions, catapulted from 505,000 during 1980 to 861,000 last year. Market Watch is projecting 1983 total category sales to reach 1 million-plus.

Until now, however, the category has been limited to more tongue-twisting and foreign names; there have been no brand entries with the domestic mass clout of Seagram.

Seagram is entering the market at a time of flux.

Category leader Stolichnaya, distributed in the U.S. by Monsieur Henri Ltd. is suffering at the hands of the recent Soviet destruction of Korean Air Lines flight 007. Several of the controlled states are boycotting the brand, as are many bartenders and retailers.

But even without any imput from the anti-Soviet backlash, Stolichnaya has been under increasing competitive pressure from its most encroaching competitors, Finlandia and Absolut, with 1982 case depletions of 140,000 and 100,000, respectively.#

Polaroid, Kodak get new ads

By GAY JERVEY

In a significant strategic shift, Polaroid Corp.'s fall advertising campaign not only will stress film advantages more than ever but also take direct, visual aim at conventional photography. Competitor Eastman Kodak is showing a new aggressiveness as well.

Sources indicate that the Polaroid campaign looms as one of the most aggressive in its recent history, both in terms of spending and creative tack.

Increasingly over the past year, the company has charted instant photography's survival on the notion of its intrinsic values—immediate gratification and spontaneous, shared delight. But it has never been as feisty as it now plans to be.

Polaroid would not reveal its planned ad budget, but traditionally the company has spent far more heavily in the fourth quarter in the hope of merry Christmas sales. Last year, the company spent $35 million dollars on cameras and film in a variety of campaigns; nearly 85% of all measured advertising went to network tv.

Computer war gets new entry

By BOB MARICH

Hewlett-Packard Co. has been a technology-driven company, but now its personal computer group is putting marketing into the driver's seat.

The launch of the HP 150 Touch Screen Computer, a business-oriented personal computer, marks the first time a Hewlett-Packard product is introduced with tv advertising. H-P, Palo Alto, Cal., has used tv only for occasional image-building advertising.

The personal computer group will back the Touch Screen Computer with a $7.5 million burst November through January that includes a 10-market spot tv campaign. A year ago, H-P spent $2 million during the same period. J. Walter Thompson USA, San Francisco, is the agency.

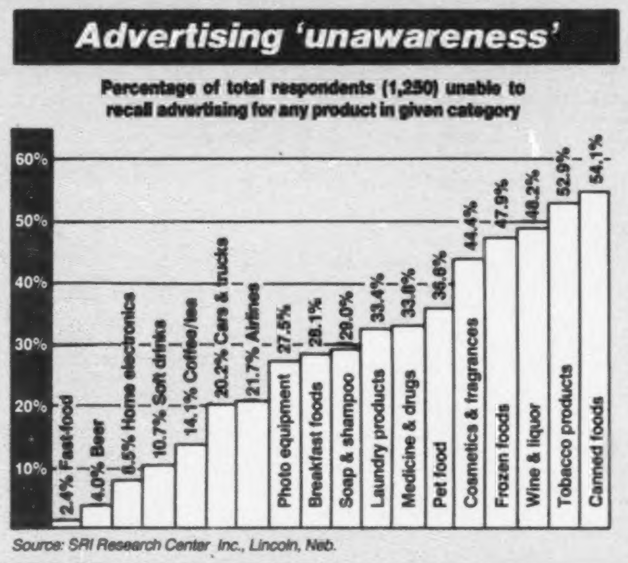
"The advertising is a prerequisite to wide retail distribution," said Thomas Darnall, manager-national advertising for the group.

H-P expects to triple its computer retail network to 1,000 outlets in the next few months, he said. The stepped-up advertising is aimed to convince retailers H-P is serious about the personal computer market. The tv spot is built around a caterpillar changing into a butterfly, implying Touch Screen Computer users' productivity likewise will soar.

As the name indicates, the Touch Screen Computer can be operated when a user touches various commands displayed on the screen. Invisible beams of light shining across the screen, forming a grid, are the key to the touch feature. When a finger or pencil eraser touches the screen, in effect blocking light beams, commands are entered.

Marketing figured heavily into the computer's design because research indicated that would-be business computer buyers are putting off purchases for fear of computers' complexities.

The computer, which will begin shipping in October, retails for $3,995, including 256 K memory and dual micro floppy discs.#



Advertising 'unawareness'

Percentage of total respondents (1,250) unable to recall advertising for any product in given category

Ad recall problem just won't let go

By SCOTT HUME

Tv spots for Quaker 100% Natural cereal contrast consumers who can't remember what cereal they had for breakfast with those who had 100% Natural and remember it throughout their day.

ADVERTISING AGE's adWatch survey shows that many consumers not only have trouble remembering the names of the brands they buy but also the advertising for any brands in many categories.

adWatch

The August survey produced few significant changes in recall of advertising in 18 consumer product categories, but showed, as it has every month since the survey began in April, 1982, that in every category some consumers remain unreached by advertising messages despite increasing ad spending.

Of the 1,250 consumers asked in August to name the first advertised breakfast cereal brand that came to mind from all the advertising they had seen, heard or read in the previous 30 days, 351 (or 28.1%) said that none came to mind. Not one.

Demographic research may suggest that a media buy will reach a given percentage of a product's target market. But what percentage truly is being reached by a message rather than merely exposed to it?

That certainly isn't a new question for advertisers to ponder. But adWatch figures show it continues to be a problem, in varying degrees, for all consumer product marketers.

The breakfast foods category isn't the most seriously afflicted with advertising "unawareness." More than half the respondents in last month's survey were unable to recall a recently seen, heard or read advertisement for canned foods (54.1%) or tobacco products (52.9%).

Arguably, since the government says less than half the adult population smokes tobacco (and, of course, has banned cigaret spots from

Ad drive extends welcome mat

Arby's finally finds strategy

By SCOTT HUME

ATLANTA—Arby's finally appears to know where it belongs.

After years and millions of advertising dollars spent positioning itself as an alternative to hamburgers, Arby's is confident about and comfortable with its image, its marketing niche and its agency.

That new-found self-satisfaction will be evident this week when the Royal Crown Cos. unit launches its new network tv campaign.

Themed "Welcome to Arby's, you're right where you belong," each of the two 30-second spots (the first of a projected half-dozen that will be produced) focuses on a take-charge type who ends a group's confusion about where to eat by leading the pack to Arby's.

The song accompanying this trek proclaims, "Welcome to Arby's, you're really going strong, you know where you belong."

The campaign, the first national effort for Arby's from Grey, New York, is the culmination of a corporate reevaluation that signals an end to the 1,250-unit chain's confusion about where it is going.

In the past, Arby's advertising has concentrated on luring customers away from McDonald's, Burger King and Wendy's by positioning Arby's roast-beef-sandwich menu as an alternative to hamburgers.

If the "Welcome to Arby's, you're right where you belong" theme sounds reminiscent of both the "Welcome to Miller time" and "You're Wendy's kind of people" themes, it's not surprising.

The strategy behind the Arby's campaign combines the punchy advertising of the beer and soft-drink companies with the upbeat, adult-oriented positioning that Wendy's always has embraced.

That direction comes from vp-marketing Robert McDowell, who joined Arby's earlier this year after six years in Anheuser-Busch's marketing department.

Mr. McDowell talks about "consumer brand-preference research," "psycho-demographics" and refers to fast-food as a "packaged good."

Such talk, Arby's executives admit, would have been heresy in

TRIPLE SAFETY SEALED, tamper resistant

Repackaged in tamper-resistant containers, and backed by heavy advertising and couponing, Tylenol bounced back quickly from the poisoning tragedy and publicity of a year ago.

By NANCY GIGES

The impromptu crisis management approach that Johnson & Johnson adopted a year ago this week enabled Tylenol, its star performer, to weather an unforeseen disaster better than any well-thought-out plan the company could have developed.

In retrospect, J&J chairman James Burke, said there is probably not much he would do differently in the days that followed the tragic deaths of seven people poisoned by cyanide placed in capsules of Extra-Strength Tylenol.

When the first word of the poisonings reached J&J last Sept. 30, the company stopped advertising; withdrew from the marketplace all Tylenol capsules nationwide, and told American consumers of the situation through cooperation with the media in granting interviews and answering questions. Within two months, the company had begun an aggressive drive to revive the brand.

The plan included newspaper advertising telling consumers how they could exchange any capsules they had in their homes for tablets or a refund. There were tv commercials featuring McNeil Consumer Products' medical director talking about the trust the brand had established over the years and stressing that J&J would do everything possible to reestablish that trust.

In December, McNeil ran coupons worth $2.50 in newspaper ads. By January, the company was back on the market with capsules repackaged in a triple-sealed tamper-evident container and advertising to announce the introduction.

The cost to J&J of the capsule withdrawal and of lost profits was placed at $50 million after taxes, an amount written off in the fourth quarter of last year. Not included in that figure is the estimated $60 million J&J has been spending this year to advertise Tylenol, a figure probably $20 million more than the company would have spent if the incident had not occurred.

Now, one year later, with Tylenol acetaminophen at about a 30% market share of the $1.2 billion over-the-counter analgesic market, only seven points below its prepoisoning share, the McNeil brand is facing a much different challenge.

The Food & Drug Administration is finalizing approval of a new analgesic for marketing without prescription. That drug, ibuprofen, has

Third World healthcare: Uncultivated market?

By Joi Nunzio

From the moment the pharmaceutical industry learned about Duke University sociologist Dr. Gary Gereffi's new book about drug industry practices in Third World countries, its tension headache No. 9 started coming on again.

The book, "The Pharmaceutical Industry and Dependency in the Third World," took a long, critical look at what multinationals have done—and not done—in advancing healthcare in developing nations, basically calling the performance lousy.

The worst of the charges accused pharmaceuticals of falling short of the needs of the countries and of what local companies are able to do in products, marketing and pricing.

The irony is that the book, published this month by Princeton University Press, came just when the pharmaceuticals gained solid footing in a number of programs to strengthen distribution and marketing in developing nations.

One of the programs the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Assn. (PMA) is proudest of, the Gambia Project, "redesigned" the Gambian drug distribution system so that people who needed drugs most in the impoverished West African nation were able to get them.

Joi Nunzio is a New York-based free lance writer.

Ten association members—Bristol-Myers Co., Johnson & Johnson, Eli Lilly & Co., Merck Sharp & Dohme division of Merck Inc., Pfizer Inc., Schering-Plough Corp., G.D. Searle Co., SmithKline Beckman Corp., Sterling Drug Co. and Syntex Laboratories—kicked in roughly $17,000 each in financial or product contributions.

Key to the system are 12 regional health centers where locals can go for care.

"Critics said that price was the reason that drugs weren't getting around," says Jay Kingham, PMA's vp-international division. "Our feeling was that the difficulty was delivery: Improve the infrastructure. We believed we could do it without increasing the drug budget."

Enthusiastic about the results of the Gambia project, the PMA is exploring the possibility of replicating the program later on in Sierra Leone, another African nation.

But what does this really mean in terms of the pharmaceuticals' commitment to Third World healthcare? Do they really see it as a growing market crying for attention and on line to get it?

Or are the PMA's and individual company efforts piecemeal and cosmetic, as some critics suggest?

In all honesty—and Mr. Kingham is the first to admit this—most of the developing nations (there are about 130 of them) are destined to remain a small part of the over-all market.

One of the chief reasons U.S. and foreign-based companies back away from them, Mr. Kingham says, is the "whole battery of complicated regulations limiting foreign investment." This was particularly true through the 1970s, when Third World leaders actively encouraged growth of domestic companies.

"Real market potential exists in only a handful of countries," —among them Brazil, India, Mexico, Argentina, Venezuela, Taiwan and South Korea, Mr. Kingham says. Setting these countries apart are the natural resources they found or the commodities they are able to export.

They also have some degree of political stability, which is essential from the pharmaceuticals' view—and which happens infrequently, many executives think.

Today, in total market share, Third World trade in the least developed countries accounts for 5% to 6% in dollar sales in a total $70 billion market, exclusive of the Eastern bloc, according to David West, senior vp of IMS International, a Philadelphia marketing company specializing in pharmaceuticals. He says the U.S. and Canada combined account for about 30% of total business; Western Europe, another 30%; Japan, upwards of 15%; Latin America, less than 10%, and Africa, Asia and Austral-Asia, about 15%.

Does Mr. West see developing nations as commercially attractive? "You can color me a skeptic," he says. "On the plus side, you have the fact that there's unquestionably very large population growth going on and forecasted ahead to the year 2000. So there's going to be a lot of people needing healthcare and pharmaceuticals. The negative side of it is strictly an economic one. Are these people or are the countries on their behalf going to be able to extend medical care to those who need it? I think there is very great doubt about that."

Over-all, it's fair to say many top American and foreign marketers have some Third World presence. Until now much of that was focused, in critics' opinions, on nations such as Mexico, Taiwan, Argentina and South Korea, which can afford Western drugs like anticancer and cardiovascular products.

Even when the marketers ventured into politically and economically less stable places, critics say, it was mainly to serve urban populations, leaving out people on the fringe.

In his research, sociologist Dr. Gereffi found something more damaging in terms of public opinion. He says the three most prevalent diseases in India are filariasis, malaria and dysentery. "Of the 15 leading pharmaceutical products in terms of sales in 1978, not one was used in the treatment of those diseases," he says.

Not surprisingly, market researcher, Mr. West believes the pharmaceutical companies, staffed by executives with "a lot of international experience," show a "high degree of social responsibility and commitment," despite the obstacles and bad publicity.

He believes many companies, including Ciba-Geigy, Hoffman-LaRoche and Merck Sharpe & Dohme, do tropical disease research and others participate in industrywide programs.

"I think they feel a great responsibility to do what they can, and I think they're quite generous in making low-price drugs available to poorer countries," he says.

Yet companies differ in their opinions as to where they should maintain Third World operations, with what drugs and at what prices.

American Cyanamid Co., which has subsidiaries in India, Pakistan and some Latin American nations, isn't working on new drugs for malaria, tuberculosis and parasitic disorders, says Dr. Jan Dlouhy, vp-planning.

The reason: "There are already excellent drugs available for malaria, superb drugs available for tuberculosis—cheap, effective, safe," he says. "If you want to avoid parasitic diseases, all you need is a clear, clean supply of water."

He adds, "If you really want to cure 90% of the diseases in the Third World the drugs and the means are here right now."

Dr. Dlouhy dismisses the drug development issue as a "political football." And while he doesn't think anyone's wasting his time doing research, he doesn't think anyone's spending "that much money on it either."

A different view is apparent at Ciba-Geigy, where staffers are working on a number of programs. Charles Ziegler, vp in the Ardsley, N.Y., office, says one of the programs, Servepharm, produces "about 40 essential drugs, including vitamins. It sells them at a modest price and for a small profit."

The company also developed a drug, Ambilhar, for schistosomiasis (a liver infection spread by worms) and two drugs, Rimactan and Lamprene, specific for leprosy. Working with UNICEF, another Ciba effort involves an oral rehydration salt. It allows the body to absorb 25 times more water and is used on children suffering severe diarrhea. "It has a tremendous impact on survival," says Mr. Ziegler.

Rahway, N.J.-based Merck also has a number of ongoing programs. Among them is research on Chagas' disease, a parastic disorder prevalent in Latin America. The disease causes psychosis and coma.

Another program focuses on onchocerciasis (river blindness), which comes from a worm-like parasite in Africa.

Robert Fluss, executive director for new market development at Merck, says the company "still maintains a presence in Latin America, even though there are some very severe economic problems there."

Privately, a few high-level executives admit that critics played a role in getting them to review their policies in controversial areas. Looking into volatile subjects like overpricing and dumping dangerous drugs on unsuspecting people, most marketers came away feeling they didn't do anything wrong.

Merck's Mr. Fluss voices the sentiments of many when he says: "We have taken a hard look and satisified ourselves that we're not doing anything inappropriate. We are not overstating our claims. We have strict labeling policies."

Unfortunately, good intentions notwithstanding, the bottom line is dollars.

"Let me give you a figure for what the Third World means to Americans in economic terms," says the PMA's Mr. Kingham. "Our American drug companies' return from sales in the Third World, either measured as a percentage of sales or a return on our investment in equity in those countries, is less than half what our return is on sales from the Western world."

Ad recall

tv), it is not surprising that a majority of consumers would pay no heed to tobacco advertising.

Yet while a significant percentage of adults drink neither coffee nor tea, only 14.1% of respondents were unable to recall ads for a specific brand in that category.

No advertising for a wine or liquor brand came to mind for nearly half (48.2%) of those polled, but 96% were aware of advertising for at least one beer brand.

Are the differences attributable to the basic level of consumer interest in a product category or the abilities of specific advertisements to capture consumers' attention? AdWatch is a joint project of Advertising Age and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a random sample of consumers to name the advertising that first comes to mind of all seen, heard or read during the previous 30 days.

Last month, 1,250 people were questioned by phone from Aug. 1 through Aug. 20. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered a statistically significant change attributable to more than variations in the sample itself.

One of the two significant changes in rankings last month occured in the airlines category, where Eastern Air Lines' ad awareness dropped 4 percentage points to 13.8% of first responses. United Airlines' ad awareness also was down, off 1.4 points to 14.8%, but it moved into the No. 1 position last month for the first time since the December, 1982, survey. American Airlines replaced TWA as No. 3 with a 1.6 point gain to 10.6%.

August is a prime summer vacation month, perhaps helping to explain why only a relatively small 21.7% of the sample could not recall any airline ads last month.

Lipton lost some of the ground it had been gaining in the high-awareness coffee & tea category in the past two months. After awareness of its advertising rose 4.5 points in June and another 3 points in July, Lipton dipped 3.9 percentage points in August. With 12.7% of responses in the category, it dropped from the No. 2 to the No. 3 slot, behind Folger's (up slightly to 20.1%) and Maxwell House (up 1 point to 17.6%).

In other categories last month:

- The fast-food category registered the highest over-all awareness last month, with 97.6% of respondents able to recall advertising for a specific brand. McDonald's continued to dominate this category as no other single brand in any other category does, although the John Houseman tv spots aired during the month failed to widen Big Mac's lead. Its 45.4% share of first responses was down slightly more than 1 percentage point from the July survey but still far ahead of No. 2 Burger King, whose awareness dipped 2.4 points to 14.4%. No. 3 Wendy's continued to increase awareness. Its 7.9% share of first responses in August represented a nearly 2 percentage-point gain and was its highest since the survey began in April, 1982.
- Only 8.5% of respondents could not recall any advertising for home electronics products last month. Atari's ad awareness dropped from 16.8% to 15.7%, but that was still enough to keep it ahead of No. 2 Apple, which gained nearly 2 points to 6.6%. Texas Instruments' 1.1 point gain moved it ahead of General Electric into the No. 3 spot.
- Although more than half the survey could not recall any tobacco products advertising last month, the 47.1% who could responded with the names of several brands with nearly equal frequency. Marlboro remained No. 1 with 8.7% of responses and was followed by four other brands less than 2 percentage points apart. Skoal moved from No. 5 to No. 2 as its share rose from 3.1% to 4.5%. Winston followed closely with 4.4%. No. 4 Salem was named by 3%; Camel by 2.7%.
- Purina built upon the 3.2 percentage-point gain it registered in July, rising from 11.4% to 11.9% in August to maintain its No. 1 rank in the pet foods category. Alpo remained a strong No. 2 with 8.8% of responses (down 1 point from July). Kal Kan rose two spots to No. 3 with a 1.5 point increase to 4.3%.
- Kodak also built upon its impressive gain in July with another 0.5 point increase to 34.3% of responses in the cameras & photographic equipment category. Canon (13%) and Polaroid (6.6%) continued as No. 2 and 3, respectively.
- Coming full circle to the breakfast foods category, No. 1 Kellogg broke away a bit from the tightly bunched pack, rising 2 percentage points to an 8.6% share. Total kept pace with a 2-point rise of its own, moving it into the No. 2 spot with 6.9%. Cheerios' 1 point rise to 6.4% kept it No. 3.#

Four A's film tells process of self-rule

New York—The American Assn. of Advertising Agencies is going to consumers with its story of self-regulation in a new 24-minute film narrated by sportscaster Frank Gifford.

Titled "The Advertising Industry: The Case for Self-Regulation," the film explains the process of creating an ad, including a review by the agency attorneys, broadcast network clearance executives and final production.

It also details how the National Advertising Review Board and the National Advertising Division of the Council of Better Business Bureaus are called in if there is a claim against an advertiser.

The film is being offered for rental at $100 or for purchase at $180.

Arrangements can be made through Mary Lord, American Assn. of Advertising Agencies, 666 Third Ave., New York 10017.#

New push for public tv ads

By DIANE MERMIGAS

Some major-market public broadcasters and corporate sponsors have joined forces to lobby congressional support for reinstituting limited advertising on public tv.

But another group of underwriters, led by the oil companies, are opposing the idea.

The first of the pro-advertising efforts is a letter mailed late last week to key legislators by the 15 corporate members of the Committee in Support of Selective Advertising on Public TV, requesting action to allow public tv stations the option of continuing to accept limited advertising.

The committee includes Swift & Co., Kraft Inc., Commonwealth Edison, A.C. Nielsen Co., Hallmark Cards, Allstate Insurance, Eastern Air Lines, J. Walter Thompson Co. and Foote, Cone & Belding.

All of the companies participated in the 13-month limited advertising experiment conducted at five public tv outlets that ended in June and netted $3.1 million in revenues for the stations.

"We believe that limited advertising, which would involve such things as clustering of commercials between programs, is an effective way to raise more much-needed funds for public tv without being a detriment to the character of public broadcasting," said Mark Quirk, director of marketing services for Chicago-based Swift.

It is unclear whether the committee will go beyond the letter-writing effort to win congressional support. But it is likely some of its corporate members will engage in individual lobbying.

In any case, they may run up

MCI aiming at U.S. mail

By ROBERT RAISSMAN

MCI Communications is taking dead aim on the U.S. Postal Service in a $30 million campaign supporting its new electronic postal service, MCI Mail.

The system will deliver both computer and paper messages anywhere in the U.S. cheaper and faster than any existing delivery service, the Washington-based company said.

It also said its ad campaign marks the first time an electronic-mail service has taken its message directly to individual consumers.

Ally & Gargano, the New York agency that already has done battle with the postal system through its advertising for Federal Express, has created an MCI campaign that makes the comparison between an antique postal system and the high-tech MCI Mail, modestly billed as, "The nation's new postal system."

'Right Stuff' ads not big stuff for Glenn

By JENNIFER PENDLETON

Los Angeles—If "The Right Stuff" propels Sen. John Glenn (D., O.) into the White House in 1984, it will not be because the candidate got star billing in the movie's ads.

While the former astronaut has been at the center of prerelease hype for the Warner Bros. film based on Tom Wolfe's best-selling book, Sen. Glenn gets no special treatment in newspaper ads and tv commercials backing its Oct. 21 debut.

"John Glenn is part of an ensemble," Ashley Boone, marketing executive of Ladd Co., producer of the movie, said of the movie's print ads, which will break in Oct. 9. "In no way will he be emphasized."

The ads will feature a sketch of the heads of the seven Mercury astronauts on Mount Rushmore. One corner of the ad will show a drawing of test pilot Chuck Yaeger, portrayed in the book and in the movie as a prime example of someone with "The Right Stuff," walking away from a crashed plane.

The ads will feature quotes from Time writer and movie critic Richard Schickel and a general comment about the film from Newsweek's Oct. 3 cover story.

Tv commercials will start Oct. 12.

Ladd Co. vp-advertising and publicity Bob Dingilian is quick to point out that the movie has no relationship to the Glenn campaign, nor has Ladd Co. heard from the Glenn forces regarding possible promotional tie-ins.

Sen. Glenn has been reported as having early misgivings about the film, and a spokesman for the presidential campaign stated flatly that there are no plans to use the film as a tool for the Glenn candidacy.

"The senator wasn't connected with the making of the film and won't help promote it," California coordinator Lynn Sadler said. Sen. Glenn said he will not attend the Oct. 16 premiere of the film in Washington.

Still, if the film is successful, as most predict it will be, the Glenn campaign stands to gain. At the very least, it will remind the public of the senator's position as a bona fide American hero.

Sen. Glenn also will benefit from the studio's $6 million advertising campaign for the film and a tv and outdoor advertising drive, which is under way, in support of Bantam Books' movie tie-in reprinting of the book.

Bantam, sensing there would be new interest in the book after the movie's release, issued a movie tie-in edition Aug. 24.

In addition to the studio's newspaper and tv campaign, the studio is promoting "The Right Stuff" with a special promotion aimed at the college market—the traditional movie-going age group and a market that is heavily Democratic and liberal.

"The Right Stuff Sweepstakes," a drawing that is being supported by ads in college newspapers, is offering technology-oriented prizes, such as an Atari "Star Wars" video arcade game, computers and car stereos.

Some opponents said the movie will not have a major impact, noting that the core of the moviegoing audience, 18 to 24 years old, doesn't vote in great numbers.

But other, more candid, observers admit that given the generally positive treatment Sen. Glenn receives in the movie, he is likely to profit by it.

"Unless the actor portraying him [stage actor Ed Harris] is no good, it's got to be a shot in the arm for Glenn," Democratic political analyst Harvey Englander said.#

CBS hints fall series rejuggling

New York—CBS executives admit they are uneasy about the advantages ABC and NBC have garnered going into the new prime time tv season.

But Harvey Shephard, senior vp-programing at CBS Entertainment, will give shows in trouble spots like Sunday, Tuesday and Wednesday at 8 p.m. (ET) four to five weeks to prove themselves. Moves to strengthen CBS' schedule will come before the November ratings sweeps.

Depending on the performance of CBS' series season premieres Oct. 2, Mr. Shephard said the network may decide to throw increased promotions behind some of its Sunday shows.

"ABC already is going into the new season with the Olympics and the World Series, and now it seems to have established a hit on Sunday night with 'Hardcastle & McCormick,' " Mr. Shephard said.

"At this point all we can do is hope that audiences come back to our established shows and that it is just a short-term thing."

In its second time out Sept. 25, "Hardcastle & McCormick" garnered a 20.7 rating/33 share against the opening hour of the Emmy Awards on NBC and an

Coke's Wine Spectrum sale sets stage

Seagram zeros in on Gallo

By RUTH STROUD

Coca-Cola Co., which has been stirring up the wine industry with its aggressive, comparative advertising tactics for about six years, is now bowing out. And Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, which had developed a long-range plan to expand its wine business, benefits by it.

In fact, New York-based Seagram emerges as the main challenger to market leader E.&J. Gallo Winery.

Coca-Cola, pending completion of an agreement signed last week, will sell its Wine Spectrum subsidiary to Seagram for an estimated $230 million in cash.

The news climaxed weeks of speculation that Coca-Cola was looking for a buyer for its California and New York wine business, rumors that Coca-Cola repeatedly denied (AA, Aug. 15).

Two Seagram wine units make news with new products—see Page 14.

A spokesman for the Atlanta-based company said Seagram approached Coca-Cola about seven weeks ago and was informed that the Wine Spectrum was not for sale. However, Seagram came back with another offer. A letter of intent on the deal was inked the last weekend in September, he said.

The agreement gives Seagram all properties of the Wine Spectrum, a conglomerate Coca-Cola began putting together in 1977. It includes Sterling Vineyards in California's Napa Valley, Monterey Vineyard at Gonzales, Cal., and New York-based Taylor Wine Co. and Great Western Winery.

If completed, the deal would catapult Seagram, the country's largest distiller,

Gannett boss Allen Neuharth gives new USA Today president Cathleen Black a look at the product she'll be selling to advertisers.

'USA Today' No. 2 slot goes to Black

By RICHARD L. GORDON
and STUART EMMRICH

Gannett chief Allen Neuharth's daring new gamble at USA Today has put a "hot" young magazine publisher in the skipper's chair just when fresh advertising breezes are needed to fill its sails.

The shuffle that put New York publisher Cathleen Black, 39, in the president's slot, the No. 2 position under USA Today publisher John Heselden, was accompanied last week by a new circulation claim that puts USA Today's daily net paid at 1,163,937, ahead of year-end targets.

But the new figure represents sales in 17 markets. By comparison, Gannett last April reported Price Waterhouse figures of 1,109,587 in 15 markets. The figure released last week also represents sales of the Sept. 15 issue, Gannett said, which occurred in the middle of highly promoted rollouts in the Cleveland and Boston/New England markets.

Gannett said its new circulation number, prepared to meet U.S. Postal Service requirements, will be supplanted soon by its first official Audit Bureau of Circulations report.

Though house ads in USA Today last week suggested ABC data may be available before the year is over, a company official said the

Miller sets major tv buy: 2-year CBS sports deal

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Miller Brewing has made a record-setting buy on CBS Sports programing that will run from 1984 through 1985.

The deal comes only a month after Miller elected not to renew its exclusive sponsorship of ABC's "Monday Night Baseball" for 1984. It also runs counter to speculation that had Miller cutting back on its sports advertising commitments.

Industry observers thought Miller pulled out of "Monday Night Baseball" in part because its $26 million commitment to the 1984 Summer and Winter Olympics had drained its sports budget.

Officials of the Milwaukee brewer, its agency Backer & Spielvogel and CBS vp-sales Jerome Dominus all declined to comment on the deal. However, a source said it was the first two-year advertising sale ever made by the network.

Last year, American Home Products made a five-year buy on NBC programing, but it was not limited to a single programing category such as sports.

While no sources commented on the precise amount of the Miller-CBS Sports deal, several said it was the largest single sale ever made on CBS Sports. There were no details about whether Miller purchased any program exclusivities, nor any detailing of the programs Miller brands will appear in.

Reports had circulated all week that Miller was unhappy with its agency, B&S, and that the brewery was actively conceding important parts of its franchise in sports sponsorships.

The CBS buy, however, is now being interpreted in part as a misreading by speculators of Miller's strategy. There was further speculation that Miller could have been negotiating the CBS buy before or at the same time that it was pulling out of "Monday Night Baseball."

Miller dropped "Monday Night Baseball" when ABC increased the minimum ad minutes required to maintain product exclusivity from three minutes per game to six. After Miller backed off the deal, the beer sponsorship was split between two advertisers with three minutes a game each. Stroh Brewery has purchased three of the minutes per game.#

Bloomingdale's future in expanding its mystique

By PAT SLOAN

New York—Strains of "Another Night on Broadway" filter through the yards of sheets and towels as a shopper makes her way to the executive offices of Bloomingdale's 59th Street store to register a complaint. Another customer, for no apparent reason, she says, has bopped her over the shoulder with a shoe in the Chanel department.

It is, in fact, just another day at Bloomingdale's.

The supposed victim is led away by the store manager, who has been summoned to deal with this atypical allegation, which all the same lends credibility to the Bloomingdale's mystique. In another store, a wallet might be lifted by a pickpocket on a busy floor but, presumably, only in Bloomingdale's would two well-heeled patrons go at it in the, quelle scandale, Chanel Boutique.

Of course, it is for less outlandish happenings that Bloomingdale's likes to think of itself as the store "like no other store in the world," an old theme that is resurfacing in its ads this year.

It was, after all, the first major store to tap the China market after the U.S. embargo on trade was lifted in 1971; the first store to stage multi-million-dollar extravaganzas honoring the craftsmanship of individual countries, including China, and the first—and maybe only—to whet the appetite of its customers for Himalayan mango ice cream.

It was Bloomingdale's that brought Ralph Lauren along from mere men's tie designer to omnipotent fashion name and coddled Halston during the early years with his own shop, after being the first to show his ready-to-wear collection.

But for marketers of Australian products, the victory might have greater implications.

"We certainly are looking for ways we can whip up additional enthusiasm for Australian products now," said Greg Burns, Australian Trade commissioner based here.

By ROBERT REED

NEW ORLEANS—The threat of a ban on broadcast beer advertising is growing stronger, but so far the brewing industry has yet to address the challenge with a united front, industry leaders say.

William Howell, president of the nation's No. 2 brewer, Miller Brewing Co., warned distributors here about the grass-roots effort aimed at getting beer commercials off the air—an action, he says, that is reminiscent of the successful 1960s movement to remove cigaret advertising from tv.

Mr. Howell said that the entire industry should begin to aggressively combat this threat, by lobbying against it at the federal and state legislative levels.

The industry also should begin cooperating with "responsible" public-interest groups to develop suitable guidelines for beer advertising, he added.

"If we are going to go down, then, damn it, let's go down fighting," Mr. Howell told distributors attending the annual National Beer Wholesalers Convention.

William Smith, president of Pabst Brewing Co., also addressed the issue, telling wholesalers that pressure is mounting on Congress and stating that anti-advertising action will mean "turning back the clock to the days of Prohibition.

"We must start telling the story that beer is the beverage of moderation" said Mr. Smith, who added that the banning of tv commercials would not have an effect on alcohol abuse or drunken driving.

Recently, various organizations throughout the country have advocated restrictions on the advertising of beer and wine (AA, July 18).

Groups such as Mothers Against Drunk Driving (MADD); the Wisconsin Citizens Council on Alcohol and Abuse, and the Washington D.C.-based Center for Science in the Public Interest have all voiced concern that advertising is creating a climate that leads to alcohol abuse and drunk driving.

Mr. Howell stated that Miller has talked with representatives from MADD and various national college organizations to develop suitable marketing and ad guidelines.

Anheuser-Busch, the No. 1 brewer, also has had talks with MADD and other groups.

While industry leaders admit the threat is real, they have yet to come forth with a consolidated effort to oppose it.

Although brewing executives agree with Mr. Howell's assertions, they also contend that Miller's absence from the U.S. Brewers Assn. makes it impossible for the industry to fight back as one group. Miller left the USBA in the late 1970s, as did G. Heileman Brewing Co., when both brewers had disputes over association policies.

The lack of solidarity can be attributed mainly to the white-hot competition that has engulfed the industry within recent years. Also, flatness in the marketplace has forced all brewers to concentrate more on their own interests.

Meanwhile, in other beer industry news:

- Heileman is looking to buy some time on network tv. So far the LaCrosse, Wis.-based brewer, which has a bevy of regional brands but no one national brew, has been using spot tv and paying a premium. Heileman is hoping to work out arrangements whereby it can buy network time but still target the commercials for different brands in specific areas.
- M*A*S*H beer makes its debut this week. Skokie, Ill.-based Hawkeye Distilling is selling the brew in 50 states. It is packaged in a green camouflage-design can. "We intend to make this a national beer without spending 25¢ worth of advertising," said a spokesman for Hawkeye. "Who needs advertising when you've already got 'M*A*S*H' playing all over the country?" The beer is brewed by Falstaff Brewing and will sell at premium prices.
- Stroh Brewery is repositioning its Schlitz beer in some markets. In those northern areas and Florida, where the new Schlitz ad campaign is not running, the company is selling the brew at lower prices—in the popular-price segment.#

New bank rates create ad flurry

NEW YORK—Financial institutions unleashed a final ad drive last week prior to offering new interest rates available today as a result of another step in deregulation.

The new banking regulations allow banks and savings institutions to pay what they please on small certificates of deposit. For the first time federal regulations do not require a minimum balance on high-yielding CDs with maturities of less than 30 months.

Bank Leumi headlined its ad: "And Congress said, Let there be no interest ceiling on CD's. And Bank Leumi said, Amen." Citibank was more direct in its ad, which said, "Wait for the rate!"# corrections & clarifications

- The correct opening date of the Clint Eastwood movie, "Sudden Impact," is Dec. 9 (AA, Sept. 19, P. 98). Also, tv spots for the movie were placed by Western Media, Los Angeles.
- Updated circulation for France's Le Monde (AA, Sept. 19, P. M-28) shows a continuing downward trend: 400,168 daily and 371,261 Sundays.
- After the Cedar Rapids Gazette converted from a.m. to p.m. (AA, Sept. 19, P. M-56), the Des Moines Register's circulation dropped 27% only in Linn County, Ia., where Cedar Rapids is located. The Register's market penetration in this area is currently 6.1%.
- The ad linage report should have noted that the September, 1983, figure for Family Circle represented one issue, compared to two for September, 1982 (AA, Sept. 19, P. 82).

Giarraputo moves to Viare Publishing

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

NEW YORK—The entrepreneur who helped to found, and then lost control of, Venture, the magazine for entrepreneurs, has joined another entrepreneur's publishing company.

Joseph Giarraputo has given up his post as publisher of Venture to take the title of exec vp-chief operating officer, a new post, at Viare Publishing (AA, Sept. 26). That company is headed by president Richard Ekstract, who started the company after he sold CES Publishing to International Thomson Business Press.

"I enjoyed being the publisher of Venture," Mr. Giarraputo said, "and I enjoyed it under what other people might have seen as the worst kind of circumstances. I'm going to miss that."

The circumstances to which he referred involve his relationship with venture capitalist Arthur Lipper III (AA, April 11). Mr. Giarraputo turned to Mr. Lipper for funds to stave off a takeover in 1981, two years after the magazine made its debut.

As Mr. Lipper's share of the business grew from a third to 93%, Mr. Giarraputo lost his posts as chairman and president of Venture Magazine, leaving him only as publisher.

Mr. Lipper said of Mr. Giarraputo's move: "As described to me by Joe, it's an excellent opportunity for him. I think he wants to have broader responsibilities than he had at Venture and he's entitled to them."

Mr. Giarraputo will remain a director of VenPub Co., the magazine's parent company, and retain ownership of his stock, which amounts to less than 7% of the total. He also will serve as a consultant to Mr. Lipper.

The president-ceo of Arthur Lipper Corp. will be acting publisher of Venture. He also is chairman of Venture Magazine and its editorial board. The publisher's slot might not be filled, Mr. Lipper said.

At Viare, "Our expectation is to build a major diversified publishing company," Mr. Giarraputo said.

He called Mr. Ekstract "one of, if not the, most successful entrepreneur publishers around."#

Earnings forecast is lowered by Avon

NEW YORK—Stressing that Avon Products retains "strong confidence" in its new earnings and recruiting programs for direct-sales representatives, Hicks Waldron, the company's new president-chief executive officer, said nonetheless "our expectations for consolidated 1983 earnings are being revised downward."

The former R.J. Reynolds Industries and Heublein leader said that while Avon is "pleased with the operating performance of our Mallinckrodt, direct-mail and specialty retailing divisions," the domestic representative business for the third quarter ending Sept. 30 is expected to "experience material decreases in sales and operating profit compared with the same period last year.

"Largely reflecting the performance of the Avon division, consolidated net income this year will be down from 1982's $196.6 million," he added.

James Preston, president of the Avon division, noted that "with the implementation of new earnings and recruiting plans for U.S. representatives and group sales leaders, we expect an improving situation for our domestic business in 1984."

He pointed out that during the past summer the rate of decline in the number of Avon's U.S. representatives accelerated. Mr. Preston added that while the average size of a representative's order continues to be greater than last year, domestic sales are "trending slightly lower."

Striving to remedy this trend, Avon is installing a supplementary program along with the Opportunity Unlimited incentive plan it put into effect last year. Avon said tests have shown the program will increase longevity and productivity of representatives.

"We believe the new programs will help us recruit and retain more productive and permanent reps," Mr. Preston said, "and enable them and group sales leaders to generate substantially higher earnings."

Currently, he said, group sales leaders and reps receive $10 in cash or a prize credit for each representative recruited on their recommendation.

The new plan offers the recruiter a 5% bonus on the sales of each new representative brought into the business for as long as both continue their association with Avon. Group sales leaders also will receive a representative development bonus of 3% on the first-year sales of all new reps in their group.

Avon also is revising its representatives' sales earnings plan.#

Of afternoon heroines and villainesses

Why advertising's housewives can't keep up with the soaps

By Hortense Leon

It is midday, and the television is tuned to ABC. There on the screen is the tempestuous Erica Kane: American beauty, owner of a new cosmetics company, killer—accidentally—of her lover. For an hour, Erica and her video community of Pine Valley go through the crests and troughs of a soap opera, "All My Children."

Hortense Leon is a Chicago-based free lance writer.

Cut to commercial: A young woman, somewhat obviously a housewife, but wearing no apron or house dress, extolls the virtues of the latest cookie mix—tastes better and easier to make, she says.

The melding of soap operas with their commercials is a curious one. On the one hand, you have a heroine who is letting her hair down in her career and her loves. On the other, you have a wholesomely domestic woman selling a product in often contrived "slice-of-life" situations.

In recent years, however, the sponsor's eternal cookie baker has undergone some change. There is less housework in today's daytime advertising, and women are no longer portrayed exclusively within the home.

Others would argue that, yes, changes have come in the portrayal of women in commercials, but a gap still exists between these ads and the women characters in the soaps.

Whether and how much that happy homemaker has changed could be a crucial question, if you consider that women make 75% to 80% of all purchases. They are major purchasers of hard package goods, although this is beginning to change as more join the workforce. They still buy most of what goes under the sink and in the refrigerator, items that have high repurchase cycles.

One who would argue that the portrayal of women in daytime commercials is keeping abreast of their soap opera counterparts is Frances Kennedy, executive vp at Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York. "Not only have women in soap operas become movers, but a lot of ads are beginning to reflect new ways of living," says Ms. Kennedy, who chairs DFS's creative board. "More and more ads recognize that women have changed. In the Bounty commercial, for example, Rosie manages her own diner. In the Luvs commercial, the father is always involved with the baby. A lot of ads are set in offices.

Peter Hannan

"However, for the products that are used in the home, it is phony to label a woman as a career woman when she is standing in her kitchen. It would be like saying, 'I don't expect that you will recognize me as a working woman. I have to tell you every chance I get.' But even in commercials that do take place in the home, women are no longer wearing aprons and housedresses. They wear pants. In fact, women lost their aprons six years ago."

Apronless women, of course, have been on the soaps even longer. And in many ways they hardly resemble earlier heroines.

Consider their development: Women on soaps, which originated in the late 1920s and early 1930s on radio, have metamorphosed. More often than not, they operate outside the home, at least in a superficial way, and are more comfortable with sex than their predecessors.

"All My Children's" Erica Kane is one prime example, but there are others.

"The Young and the Restless," a CBS drama, features femme fatale Ashley Abbott, an employe of Jabot cosmetics, who has more than a professional relationship with the company's research chemist.

"Days of Our Lives," on NBC, has Dr. Marlena Evans, a psychiatrist who also has had her share of romance outside of marriage.

The presence of more single and employed women on soaps does not tell the whole story. Says Sheri Anderson, associate head writer at NBC, "The change has been more emotional than vocational." Ms. Anderson, an eight-year veteran of soaps and a writer for NBC's "Days of Our Lives," says she sees more of an emphasis on strong characters of both sexes. "About 10 or 20 years ago, what you often saw were strong women and weak men," she says. "The characters were analagous to those on sitcoms. But women in soaps no longer want a man who is weak emotionally, nor do they want to be dominated."

Additionally, networks are writing real world changes into scripts. Ms. Anderson says, "Maggie Horton of NBC's 'Days of Our Lives' is a classic. She has grown and changed in the last five years from a dependent little girl to an independent thinker. She no longer lives through her husband. She has also started a career."

She's certainly more active, as are the other characters. "Even 10 years ago, the pace was very slow," says Ms. Anderson. "There were lots of kaffee klatsches in which women gossipped. But now people are actually doing things."

What is considered action for a soap opera, however, is still slow by most human standards. Says Toby Goldstein, feature editor of Soap Opera Digest, "Whatever role a character has, his or her function is to be in a relationship. Unless you're talking about 'Dallas,' in which the machinations of business are considered interesting, nothing is more important than being part of a couple. The main difference between now and 10 years ago, as far as real activity goes, is that the conversation has moved out of the kitchen and living room and into the work place."

Ms. Goldstein is also one who believes that the woman's changing role in the soap opera is reflected mostly in how she handles herself emotionally, rather than in a career. In the old days, she says, "It was always the man who controlled the relationship. He sought her out and ultimately had the option of calling it off."

Jacqueline Smith, vp-programing at ABC, concurs with her counterparts at the other networks and Ms. Goldstein at the Digest.

"At this point, women characters do not have to give up their femininity or be old to be strong," she says. "They don't have to be Ma Perkins to speak their minds."

So the question remains: If the soap heroines have changed so radically, why have women on daytime commercials remained relatively stagnant over the years?

Says Rena Bartos, executive vp at J. Walter Thompson USA and author of "The Moving Target: What Every Marketer Should Know About Women": "Television is a mass medium. Consequently, although you do see more sexy, sophisticated ads at night, it is not to the same degree you see them in other media, such as magazines. In print, you can more finely target your audience. As a result, you will see more upscale and sophisticated ads with, of course, more sex."

For the most part, commercials aren't tailored to the soaps. There is one monolithic exception to the rule: Procter & Gamble Productions. Because P&G produces its own soaps, it can shape the story line, which can be beneficial to its products.

CBS's "As the World Turns," a relatively tame soap, is one example of its productions. Bruce Benskin, public relations services counselor for the Cincinnati-based giant, says: "We have certain programing guidelines to make sure their soaps are acceptable to a broad audience, and that they don't portray people in a negative fashion. We want to reach the consumer in an acceptable environment. If they have aspects that are not uplifting, we do not want our commercials to air in those environments.

"At the same time," Mr. Benskin says, "P&G soaps are just like everybody else's, in that after more than 30 years, the things that concern the characters are still the same—romance, children, family, but especially romance." ■

IF YOU SPEND MONEY HERE,

BUY SOME INEXPENSIVE INSURANCE HERE.

Did you know there's an easy, inexpensive way to make every TV buy you make, better?

Just a small percentage of your TV budget spent in Outdoor can act like a media insurance policy to protect your advertising investment. And these days every TV advertiser needs insurance.

Consider some of the risks: If you need to build frequency quickly and effectively, can you afford to do it solely with TV? Will your commercial break through the clutter? Will target audiences, like working women, see your message on TV?

Unlike any other media, Outdoor complements TV because it doesn't compete with TV. It's seen away from the clutter and confusion of competing indoor media—TV, newspapers, and magazines.

In fact, Outdoor in combination with TV takes advantage of the best both media have to offer. As a high frequency medium, Outdoor makes the most of TV's reach. It can insure that the more affluent, mobile, working men and women will see your message, even if they're not watching TV. And just like TV's "road-blocking," Outdoor makes sure your TV message is unavoidable.

OUTDOOR MAKES TV LOOK GOOD.

Radio listens to an increasingly female audience

By Charline Allen

Not too long ago, Westwood One, a radio programing syndicator, decided to add a feature to its weekly celebrity show, "Earth News." The topic: How women could get credit in their own names.

Another of Westwood's weekly programs, "Spaces and Places," recently reported on "new relationships" or relationships outside marriage, featuring the man's point of view one week, the woman's the next. "On the Move," a Westwood program scheduled to be in syndication next year, would feature 90-second interviews with and stories about women on the move, such as Sally K. Ride, the nation's first woman astronaut.

That radio programers are creating features targeted to women—or, at least, designed so that women would find them interesting—should not be surprising. Working women have especially become the subject of intense interest in this medium.

For radio programers and advertisers alike, the statistics can be appealing. Consider the title of a brochure the Radio Advertising Bureau has prepared for potential advertisers: "Radio: It's Red Hot To Sell Working Women." Miles David, the RAB's vice-chairman and chief executive officer, says a spring, 1982, survey by R.H. Bruskin showed that 97% of women who work fulltime listen to the radio at least once each week, spending on the average 3 hours, 38 minutes per day with the medium.

The survey also showed that, over a 24-hour period Monday through Friday, fulltime working women spend 44% of their media time with radio, compared with 41% with tv, 9% with newspapers and 6% with magazines. In daytime hours, when most purchases are made, the working woman spends 60% of her media time with radio, 22% with tv, 12% with newspapers and 6% with magazines.

Radio is also, according to the survey, the medium fulltime working women are most likely to have listened to just before making the day's major purchase, Mr. David says. Some 60% on the average are tuned into radio at that point, compared with 14% who are watching tv, 8% reading a newspaper and 4% reading a magazine. The survey also indicated that 91% of working women commute to and from work in their cars, and that 89% who do so listen to the radio going and coming. And the survey showed that 63% of fulltime working women have a radio available in their workplace and that those who listen spend almost four hours per day tuned in at work.

Recent Arbitron data showed that, of working women 25 to 54 surveyed in Los Angeles, 80% not only listen to the radio at work, but listen all day. In Boston, 84% of those surveyed were all-day listeners.

Not only are working women listening to more radio, but the number of working women is growing, as well. According to a recent study on women in the workplace done by Torbet Radio, the number of women 20 to 64 who work is expected to grow from 46.7 million today to 52.2 million by 1990, an increase of 139% since 1960.

And, as Marian DeLuca, Torbet vp-research, points out, "Ten to 20 years ago, women played a very minor part in the workforce." Today, although there are still more women in the clerical ranks than in other areas, U.S. Census data used in the Torbet study showed that the number of female lawyers increased by 188% from 1970 to 1980. Similiarly, the number of female computer operators increased by 12% and female physicians by 44%.

The Torbet study conceded, however, that women make an average of only 60% of what men do. Some 57.7% are married, and 48.2% have children.

Many advertisers have already realized that working women are a prime segment of the radio listening audience. Cosmopolitan, for example, has editor Helen Gurley Brown as spokeswoman for its radio campaign. And Redbook, Mr. David points out, has announced in recent trade ads that it will be "using radio heavily . . . to build its base."

Mr. David also points to a shift in advertising copy that has more female appeal. Ads for Molsen's Golden beer and United Van Lines recently featured female voiceovers. A female stockbroker pitches L'Oreal Control Top Panty Hose, and a Rival Crockpot spot is aimed at meeting the busy working woman's needs.

In creating spots aimed at women, advertisers face much the same dilemma faced by radio programers. They must appeal somehow to both the male and the female members of the audience, but they must also create messages that won't patronize women, or alienate either sex.

And despite advertiser interest in reaching women, Norm Pattiz, president of Westwood One, the program producer and syndicator based in Los Angeles, cautions radio programers against making blanket assumptions about what constitutes programing that appeals to women. For example, he says more than 50% of the phone calls and letters received in response to Westwood's syndicated "Playboy Advisor" show are from women.

Indeed, many programers agree that it's difficult to determine which course to take. Still, some are creating programs that are clearly aimed at women. Jameson Broadcast, for example, is now syndicating a three-minute daily Spanish-language feature, "Circulo Familiar," based on Family Circle material. It has already cleared in 26 of the top 30 Hispanic markets.

As for the radio networking companies, both RKO and Mutual Broadcasting System say they produce no programing aimed at women, except Mutual's "Elmer Dapron's Grocery List," a midday shopping information program.

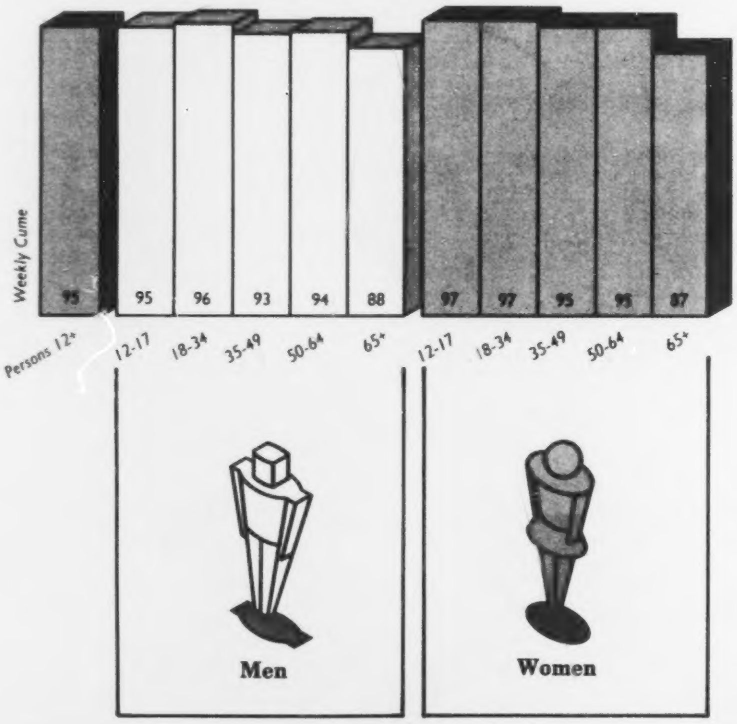
At CNN Radio, each contributor to "Talkabout" short-form features "has been specifically asked to include in their materials from time to time . . . information and advice . . . that would pertain strictly to women," says Herb New, radio planning and development coordinator. But the emphasis in the eight "Talkabout" series, which range from motherhood to health to the economy, is on appealing to both sexes, because "sometimes programs that are made just for women not only turn off the men, but turn off the women, because that in itself is a form of sexism."

CBS Radio Network and its RADIORADIO programing, as well, is not geared specifically toward women, but business reporting and personal investment advice have been beefed up recently because the company has determined that women are interested in these topics. RADIORADIO's "In Touch," which includes life style and entertainment news, and CBS Radio Network's program "Healthtalk" may have stronger appeal for women than for men, but CBS says the shows were not designed with that intent.

NBC Radio Network, Talknet and The Source each contain a sampling of programs that could be labeled "for women." On NBC Radio Network, Dr. Joyce Brothers and Carrie Carmichael's "Women in the Workplace," deal with issues ranging from dressing for the office to sexual harassment on the job. There's also "Political Digest," featuring segments on female politicians who've made a major life change with a move into the political arena.

Radio reaches more women 18-64 than men of the same age
More men 65+ are reached than women

Per cent of men and women age 12 and older who listen to radio



Talknet features Sally Jessy Raphael's nightly call-in-self-help program and personal advice on weekends from Dr. Harvey Ruben. The Source, a young adult network, features "Coping With," which deals with subjects ranging from anxiety to the economy, and "Body Language," a health, fitness and nutrition program.

Richard Penn, vp-general manager of NBC Networks, says surveys of affiliated radio station audiences have shown that old preconceptions about what listeners want are "hogwash and outdated." In response to those findings, programs have been created with an eye toward providing "me"-oriented information on money, health and high technology.

ABC's radio networks "don't do a lot of specifically female-oriented programing," says Ruth Meyer, director of programing with ABC's Entertainment and Direction networks. "We feel that women are reached by the same programing patterns as men are these days." Even "Soap Talk," heard evenings on ABC FM Network, has appeal for men as well as women, she says. The program offers a rundown of soap opera happenings for those who aren't home during the day.

Despite Ms. Meyer's contention to the contrary, ABC has its share of programs that appeal to women. On ABC Direction Radio Network, there's "Let's Cope," hosted by Dr. Laura Schlessinger, which emphasizes personal relationships. The network also has a health and fitness program called "Alive and Fit" with former Charlie's angel Jaclyn Smith. TalkRadio includes Dr. Toni Grant and Dr. Susan Forward proferring personal advice, and WABC, New York, has Dr. Lawrence Balter, Dr. Judith Kuriansky and Kathy Novak with variations on that same theme.

In syndication, as well, there is a host of similar self-help call-in shows, including "Sexually Speaking" with Dr. Ruth Westheimer, "The Sonya Friedman Show" and many more.

It's clear that women today—particularly working women—comprise a substantial segment of the programing target market, and radio advertisers and programers are rising to the challenge this demographic shift presents. RAB's Mr. David predicts that radio will grow, as a result of its other strengths, "at a rate in double digits . . . over the next 20 years of increasing media competition . . . in part because of the very substantial affinity that we have with working women."

into the No. 2 spot in the U.S. wine industry from No. 6 last year.

It also will set the stage for a face-to-face confrontation between Modesto, Cal.-based Gallo, which Impact wine and spirits newsletter calculates will have a 27.7% market share in 1983, and Seagram, whose slice of the pie will nearly double to 11.2% after the purchase.

Wine Spectrum's share of the market in 1982 was 6.2%, according to Impact.

The sale, which is subject to a definitive agreement between the two companies and the approval of both boards, isn't expected to be final until late this year.

Seagram, marketer of Paul Masson and Gold Seal wines, is expected to assign the Wine Spectrum brands to Doyle Dane Bernbach, its agency for Paul Masson.

The depressed spending on Taylor California Cellars, Wine Spectrum's feisty flagship brand, is expected to rise well above this year's roughly $5 million outlay once the industry's current price and inventory problems are overcome.

Ad spending on Taylor, currently handled by Kenyon & Eckhardt, last year was about $18 million.

The Wine Spectrum deal follows an agreement by Seagram to divest itself of its Fromm & Sichel unit, which markets Christian Brothers products, to a new company formed by the wine-making religious order (AA, Aug. 29).

Although the Fromm & Sichel divestiture had been in the works for several months, the process might have been speeded up by the imminent purchase of the Wine Spectrum and the potential for an antitrust violation by an over-large Seagram.

Ironically, the newly formed company that is taking over the brand is turning its marketing, sales and advertising management over to Albert E. Killeen & Associates, an Atlanta-based consulting company headed by Mr. Killeen, former vice-chairman of Coca-Cola Co. and former president-chief executive officer of Wine Spectrum.

Coca-Cola's decision to sell the Wine Spectrum came as no surprise to many in the wine industry, who noted that the phenomenal growth of Taylor California Cellars had flattened in recent months.

The situation was fueled by last summer's $3 rebate offers on $2.99 bottles of Taylor California Light and heavy price breaks on Vivante, Wine Spectrum's new economy brand.

Roberto C. Goizueta, Coca-Cola chairman, noted in a statement that the sale was "in line with our corporate strategy [to] concentrate our resources in the areas of our business where the returns on assets are highest."

In contrast to Coca-Cola's other businesses, wine was only marginally profitable, according to Lawrence Adelman, an analyst at Dean Witter Reynolds.

But Coca-Cola's major reason for leaving the capital-intensive wine business, analysts and competitors say, was unanticipated fierce and overwhelming competition from the privately held Gallo colossus.

"Gallo took off their gloves and made it clear to Coke that if they intend to stay in the business, it would cost them dearly," noted Manny Goldman, a partner with Montgomery Securities in San Francisco. "They outmerchandised, outadvertised, outpromoted Coke, and Coke felt it."

Gallo spent about $31.4 million in advertising in 1982.

The U.S. wine business grew only 1.8% in 1982, and is just beginning to pick up steam again with a 3.4% increase during the first six months of this year.

Coca-Cola, a late entry into what had been a rather sleepy, mostly family-run industry, made astonishing gains in a short time, moving from No. 5 in the industry at the end of 1981 to No. 3 and was headed for No. 2 this year in the wake of Heublein Wines' recent decision to sell seven brands, including Colony, to the Allied Grape Growers, a Fresno agricultural cooperative (AA, July 11).

Coke's aggressive entry into the market with a new Taylor California Cellars brand in 1978 made the industry sit up and take notice. Wine Spectrum twice challenged the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms—first over comparative advertising, the first in the wine industry, and then in 1981 over its wanting to use the word "light" to refer to wine with lower alcohol and fewer calories.

In each case, the Coca-Cola unit won the right to do things its way.

Earlier this year, it went to court again, this time to fight a California law forbidding cash rebates on wine (AA, June 6). The case is pending.

Although some reports mentioned that Mary Cunningham, exec vp-planning of Seagram Wine Co. and vp-strategic planning and project development of parent Seagram, had masterminded the Wine Spectrum deal, industry sources dismissed such accounts.

Ms. Cunningham was behind a strategic plan for increasing Seagram's wine business (AA, Dec. 13), but she has been on leave of absence while completing a book.#

'Gourmet' finally bought. . .

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

NEW YORK—Epicurean magazines formed one of the few chic categories in which there was no Conde Nast contender. Now there is: Conde Nast is sinking its teeth into the field by buying Gourmet.

After weeks of rumors that had the monthly magazine sold to just about everyone except Weight Watchers International, the trustees of the estate of Earle R. MacAusland, who founded Gourmet in 1940, reached agreement with Conde Nast on a deal that should be completed in about a month.

The purchase price was not disclosed, but industry observers peg it as high as $24 million.

For that price, Conde Nast is getting a book that's second in its field in ad pages and revenues, behind Bon Appetit, and third in rate base, behind Bon Appetit and Cuisine.

It's also buying into a battle with some powerful fellow publishers: Knapp Communications, owner of Bon Appetit; CBS Publications, owner of Cuisine; American Express Publishing Corp., owner of Food & Wine, and New Yorker Magazine Inc., half-owner of Cook's Magazine.

Asked if the category weren't especially competitive, Conde Nast president Robert J. Lapham said, "I guess it is, but aren't they all? This was an upscale area we were not in, and one we were interested in over a period of time."

Conde Nast is "gratified," Mr. Lapham said, to have won out over several other would-be buyers. Among them were the New York Times Co. (AA, June 27) and a number of unidentified parties, one of which was believed to be Hearst Corp.

Conde Nast said it is "not looking at any changes," either editorially or geographically. The magazine's offices will remain at 560 Madison Ave. rather than relocate to the Conde Nast Bldg.

It's too early to discuss whether Gourmet would be included in either of the two packages Conde Nast offers to advertisers, said Neil Jacobs, corporate sales director.#

. . .But 'Spring' not so lucky

EMMAUS, PA.—Rodale Press sprang a fall surprise last week, announcing it will fold Spring, its entry in the women's health and fitness magazine category, after the November/December issue.

"We were not able to meet our business plan expectations," said Robert Teufel, Rodale's president. Circulation of the magazine, which made its debut in April, 1982, initially averaged 353,949, well above the rate base of 250,000. Circulation in the six months ended June 30 was 466,999, exceeding a 400,000 rate base.

There were problems with advertising, production costs and editorial direction, Mr. Teufel said.

One factor, he said, was its strict policies on ad acceptability. While central to the Rodale philosophy, these policies were far tougher than those of others in the field, such as Self. By not taking ads for products such as cigarets, Spring "had to do so much better in the categories we did take," he said.#

That's a huge and desirable audience that you're missing with your network buy. For example, a one-week, $25,000 prime time network schedule in Houston delivers only 42% of adults in $35,000+ households.

Fortunately, TV isn't the only game in town. An equal $25,000 investment in The Chronicle, the Southwest's largest newspaper, would deliver 65% of these affluent adults.

ANA launches push on international front

Relaxing for a brief moment in a hectic schedule on the Homestead's front porch, newly elected Assn. of National Advertisers officers (l. to r.) Herbert Baum, treasurer; Spencer Boise, vice-chairman, and Robert Goldstein, chairman, surround outgoing chairman John Dowd.

By LARRY EDWARDS and TODD FANDELL

HOT SPRINGS, VA.—The Assn. of National Advertisers, under the direction of new chairman Robert V. Goldstein, is launching a major effort to become a more significant force in the international business arena.

Mr. Goldstein, vp-advertising at Procter & Gamble, this nation's largest advertiser, told ADVERTISING AGE in an interview here, "We have an international problem on our hands," and ANA doesn't "feel the threat is recognized."

At the Homestead for its 74th annual meeting, ANA disclosed the formation of a new committee to deal with international regulatory issues and coordinate such efforts with allied organizations.

The new ANA committee will represent the positions of multinational U.S. marketers on the many thorny issues so American companies are not "discriminated against," Mr. Goldstein said.

In outlining the agenda for his one-year leadership of ANA, Mr. Goldstein stressed the "major worldwide development of an ostensibly consumer protection movement" combined with the "economic and political confrontation between Third World countries and developed countries" as his major concern.

But Mr. Goldstein also jumped with ANA's many-membered feet into the image-of-advertising issue, saying that will be a second area of major concentration during his tenure. This puts the advertisers squarely in concert with the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies on this key subject.

Additionally, Mr. Goldstein said he will deal with the "continuity of leadership" of the organization, whose president, Peter Allport, will retire by 1985. He has been with ANA for 37 years.

Although in many ways advertising's image and international threats to the right to advertise are interrelated, it is the latter that was more decidedly cleared for action by the ANA.

The new international affairs committee, which has been preceded by an ANA study group headed by Sperry Corp.'s Richard Mau, will work on two levels,

Marketing losing best students, ANA told

HOT SPRINGS, VA.—Marketing is becoming a "second-class career choice" among young people, Assn. of National Advertisers members were told here last week by one of the industry's top recruiters and "trainers" of marketing and advertising executives, Procter & Gamble.

This warning, reinforced during a panel discussion by an academic, becomes even more disturbing for advertising in that it follows closely expressions of alarm by advertising agency executives over a lack of new creative talent.

"There is a significant decline in both the quantity and quality" of those choosing marketing as a career, said G.G. (Gibby) Carey, division manager, general advertising, P&G, at the ANA clinic.

It is a double-edged sword; not only are fewer students majoring in marketing, but "fewer [of those who do] end up in the field."

Also, "fewer of the very top students" are interested in marketing—"the intellectual quality [of those choosing marketing] has slipped." He said the "progressive decline" can be traced back over the last 10 years.

It "used to be that our field attracted the cream of the crop," he said, but "today we're in danger of getting the skimmed milk."

Marketing is "losing ground to finance" as the route to the top in business, the executive stated. "The financial field has been out working to get the top ones," Mr. Carey continued, telling recruits that "finance is what you have to have."

Such fields as investment banking are "paying huge salaries," according to the University of Virginia's Darden School Prof. Paul Farris. But in addition to that fact, P&G's Mr. Carey acknowledged that that field has successfully transformed its image from "dusty backrooms" and "green eyeshades" to the fast track to the top.

P&G recently monitored a period of time —recruiting time—at the Harvard Business School, tracking corporate executives on the campus, and it was "two to one financial

FCC rules battle hits Oval Office

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—The cat-and-mouse game over the future of the Federal Communications Commission's financial interest and syndication rules took a new turn when it was disclosed that the intense lobbying has reached the Oval Office.

FCC chairman Mark Fowler quietly was summoned late last month to brief the President on this and other hot issues. The meeting news, which broke last week, suggested that Hollywood's persistent efforts to interest the nation's highest-ranking ex-actor in the controversy had paid off.

Mr. Fowler, pressing the President's deregulation program, has enraged the Hollywood-based tv program production com-

CBS takes lead in early ratings

By JAMES P. FORKAN

NEW YORK—Sampling has been the name of the prime time tv game in recent weeks, and while ABC played best in the preseason, CBS has caught up in the past two weeks.

After two outings, CBS seemed to be delivering on its promotional copy claim that "the spirit of 'M*A*S*H' lives on" in the sequel series. "AfterMASH" has reached the Nielsen heights two weeks in a row, thereby bolstering CBS' hopes that it can fill the parent series' Monday-night shoes.

Thanks in part to "AfterMASH" and "Scarecrow & Mrs. King," CBS captured the first two nights in the second week of the fall season. CBS snared the first Monday hour as "Scarecrow & Mrs. King" bowed with a promising 22.3/35, well ahead of ABC's "That's Incredible" (a 24 share) and NBC's "Boone," the latter languishing at a 16 share two weeks straight.

Although "AfterMASH," scoring a 26.0/37 in its regular 9 p.m. spot, couldn't match its first outing, it still beat ABC's Monday football and NBC's Johnny Carson "Tonight" anniversary special during its half-hour. The Carson special then moved from third to first, averaging an over-all 20.3/31 and giving NBC No. 2 ranking for the night.

CBS' "The Jeffersons," in a one-time-only Monday outing as the second of a three-parter, was second in its half-hour, after which football took the runner-up position. "Emerald Point N.A.S.," closing the night with a 26 share for CBS, slipped from its first showing.

CBS' Oct. 4 victory was attributed to its femme-appeal made-for-tv movie, "Secrets of a Mother & Daughter" as baseball preempted NBC's "The A Team" and "Remington Steele." ABC and NBC ran neck-and-neck.

Early indications are that ABC erred in having the new "Just Our Luck" lead into

New 'Playboy' ad pitch

CHICAGO—With its November issue, Playboy says it officially has begun to change with the times.

The magazine's revamp—away from "entertainment for men" and toward a service orientation—will change the way it is sold to advertisers.

According to Charles Stentiford, New York-based senior vp-advertising, Playboy intends to make "a slight adjustment in our attitude toward how we deal with customers, by focusing our selling efforts against becoming a marketing service, offering something significant beyond the page—merchandising and promotional activities at retail."

"We want to get involved in the push and pull of the selling cycle, focusing on specific marketing needs. The days of just selling ad pages are past," the executive said.

The men's magazine has lost an estimated 2.5 million circulation in the last decade, dropping from a record high of 6.8 million to 4.1 million.

A series of editorial changes appear in the new issue, the most noticeable of which is a cover featuring a closeup of a nurse's face instead of the traditional partially dressed woman. Future issues will begin to carry more articles about male-female relationships and will showcase articles centering on women.

Observers question if these changes, some of which were announced this summer, are enough to turn the book around (AA, Aug. 1).

Whatever changes Playboy is making, "we don't have to apologize," says Mr. Stentiford, who recently joined the magazine from CBS Publications' World Tennis, where he was publisher.

"Four million people make a conscientious buying decision [each month]. We're still the single largest men's magazine published," he said.

The repositioning "will strengthen the fact Playboy is evolving with the marketplace," Mr. Stentiford said. "One of our advertisers' concerns in the past was that time is passing us by. By making this statement, we're answering that challenge."

The future of the magazine "lies in doing an out-

GM crashes in on car quality fight

DETROIT—While Ford and Chrysler fought over competitive quality claims in ads, General Motors stepped in last week with a quality claim of its own.

Chrysler earlier complained to the tv networks about Ford ad claims of superior quality. The networks went over the data again and approved the spots. Ford ads, based on a survey of new-car owners' problems, claimed its vehicles' quality was 36% better than Chrysler and 10% better than GM.

Chrysler countered with ads that pointed out Ford had more recalls than Chrysler.

Then last week, GM ads cited data on car crashes from an insurance-industry-supported institute in print ads headlined: "GM wins again. 6th year in a row." The institute figures, based on over-all injury claim experience, showed seven of the top ten "safest" cars

Merger of cable news nets near

By MAURINE CHRISTOPHER

If the Justice Department gives its blessing, entrepreneur Ted Turner will acquire his 24-hour cable news rival, Satellite News Channel, from American Broadcasting Cos. and Group W Broadcasting & Cable for about $20 million.

As soon as the agreement between Mr. Turner and the parents of Satellite News Channel is signed, Turner Broadcasting System will ask the antitrust guardians for an opinion on CNN Headline News' buyout of SNC.

The deal had not been formally announced at press time, but the SNC name is expected to be dropped as soon as the necessary clearances and formalities have been completed. What Mr. Turner has apparently acquired are the SNC contracts with systems covering 7.5 million homes. These would be switched to CNN Headline News, which currently has 4.7 million subscribers.

A noncompetitive clause that had delayed the agreement by a week or so is due to be included in the contract. TBS is expected to assure the Justice Department that it will continue to offer two round-

A perspective on today's grocer

By Kenneth Wylie

Time was, a few years ago, when a "supermarket" was a largish storefront on Main St. or a boxy building on the outskirts, usually with a big logo over the front door and probably a parking lot close by.

If you knew what an A&P looked like in Morristown, N.J., you could easily point out its clone in Chicago. Or if Safeway was the choice, you could probably find the same facade, checkouts and interior decor in Denver or Richmond, Va.

Not anymore. An A&P supermarket in Greater New York is not an A&P Super Plus warehouse store in Chicago. Nor do Safeway's Food Barn in Kansas City and its Bon Appetit in San Francisco look like brothers, or even distant cousins.

The mercurial economy and diversifying life styles of just the past few years have sent supermarkets rapidly through a kind of charismatic health club experience, and the tongues they have heard and the visions they have seen have all said: "If you want to keep making even the present slim profits, you must build size, lose fat, get stronger, think smarter, be more attractive and help your customers."

Indeed, grocery stores in 1983 come in every variety or format or shape, color, layout, bulk and inventory. Formats include the old familiar conventional supermarket, the bigger superstore, combination store (food plus drugs), warehouse stores, limited-assortment store and convenience store. But whether it's a "superstore" or a "convenience store" or a "mom-and-pop" store, the goal is the same: Bringing in the business; trying to stay at least within sight of the 1% net profit range; maximizing sales to each customer who comes through the front door.

In the 1980s, this is no easy task. The reasons are several, including heavy competition among grocery units, competition from other supposedly non-grocery stores, more out-of-home eating at places called "McDonald's" and "Burger King" and "Wendy's" and that old bugaboo—recession, or is it inflation?

Retail grocery sales in 1982 totaled an impressive $252 billion, but that was up only 4.6%, the lowest rate increase since 1966. By contrast, 40 years ago, when sales totals were in the range of $20 billion to $30 billion a year, sales gained about 20% to 25% annually.

Or as Safeway chairman Peter A. Magowan put it, when speaking of his giant company's foreign units: "The supermarket industry is a real growth industry in most countries. It is not in the United States."

Why not? The answer is all around us—American society. We want expansive displays of the provender of the land in brilliantly illuminated, air conditioned, hangar-size buildings; we want low prices and unlimited selection; generic paper towels and genuine French Roquefort; a comfortably small store around the corner; open cartons on steel shelves, one-stop shopping, all-night banking and a place to park the car.

That's what grocery retailing is all about today.

All in one stop

Don and Clare Youngberg, new to Indianapolis, are just finishing dinner in their apartment north of downtown, and they need "some things from the store."

They will drive 11 miles across town to a Kroger superstore, where they can get everything under one roof. It even has a sit-down restaurant, but Clare and Don, who share food preparations, prefer to buy Kroger groceries and eat their own cooking, perhaps economizing with a generic beer before dinner. Both are employed and could afford to shop anywhere, but Kroger is a name they both recognize from other parts of the country, and it has what they want—all in one stop.

For 1983 this is a normal state of affairs, according to Ken Partch, editor of Supermarket Business.

"There will be a trend toward larger and larger stores as store trading areas grow—traveling 90 to 100 miles is possible, but even 10 or 20 miles is a lot," he says.

Warehouse stores packing them in the aisles

Stores expanding to keep up with demand

By M. Howard Gelfand

Some time this month, the Cub warehouse store in Fridley, Minn., a Twin Cities suburb, will close. The groceries that are stacked to the ceiling will be carted off and sold to the highest bidder. Cub will sell the building to someone, just as long as they don't make a supermarket out of the place.

These days, grocery stores close all the time, but this closing is especially significant because this store started the super warehouse revolution. A supermarket was just a supermarket when Jack Hooley opened the doors 15 years ago; now there are warehouses, super warehouses, superstores and hybrids that defy any description. And Jack Hooley, as much as anyone else, has forced the competition to find distinctive niches.

Customers at Cub stores bag their own groceries . . .

But this store has a problem quite unlike those that closed many of its competitors. It's so obvious that you notice it right as you walk in: Jack Hooley can't sell groceries fast enough.

This particular morning is an average one. It's the middle of the week, and the 15 checkout counters are all busy. Grocery carts are stacked to the top with fresh produce and "hot" specials like the big $1.29 watermelons that are piled to the ceiling in huge bins at the front of the store.

"The business is so good that we can't handle the crowd," says Mr. Hooley, who opened the store with his brother Charlie in 1968. "We just can't crank enough people through the front end any more." It's an easy enough problem to solve. As soon as this Cub store closes, a new one will open a mile or so up the road. The new store will occupy 78,000 sq. ft.—almost three times the size of the old one.

It will have 27 checkout lanes, a complete bakery and its own sausage kitchen. And it will undoubtedly do what all the other Cub stores have done: Make money.

. . . at any one of the store's 27 checkout lanes.

That has been the only constant since the Hooley brothers discovered how to sell groceries 10% to 20% cheaper than conventional supermarkets. The store has evolved over the years, changing the warehouse concept in the process. In the beginning, the walls were bare brick and the floor was concrete. Most shoppers hauled their groceries in cumbersome flat carts. "We always emphasized rock-bottom prices," says Mr. Hooley, "but in the beginning it wasn't a very pleasant shopping experience."

Now there's bright paint and linoleum, standard grocery carts and the usual grocery-store music. Fresh produce was almost incidental in the begin-

Perspective

"But remember that with superhighways you can drive, say, from one side of Minneapolis to the other in 20 minutes."

This is not to say that shopping in a single store, even a superstore, has become the norm. Walter Heller, director of research with Progressive Grocer, says studies show most shoppers will go to three different supermarkets in a month while doing 75% to 80% of their buying in one of those stores.

The point is that with the current multiple grocery formats, shoppers have a choice.

Format after format

Varying formats of supermarkets is the grocery industry's way of dealing with what it sees out there in society—not the single great monolith of "the common man," but a variety of pieces or segments, each meeting a specific need.

G.E. Spitzer, general manager of Steinberg Inc., Montreal, talks about these segments, as recorded in the 1983 report "Close-Up on Today's Food Marketing," published by the Newspaper Advertising Bureau:

"The market of today—the life styles of today—are so different that basic strategies must be different. Years ago we realized that nobody could serve 100% of the market, but we said . . . we could drop the bottom 10 [and] the top 10 and zero in on the 80% in the middle. Well, that 80% no longer exists. There are different segments now."

In the past several years, such questioning and the innovations have turned the grocery marketing facility into something that is no longer a supermarket but several different kinds of stores. Each has its own chunk of total sales and dollars; each strives to serve a segment of consumers and probably reaches several in the process.

The most recent complete tabulation for the U.S., made in 1982, according to Mr. Heller of Progressive Grocer, showed a total of 162,000 grocery stores, with 28,950 of these (17.9%), in the supermarket class—that is, with at least 17,000 sq. ft. of floor space and annual sales of $2 million or more. In 1982, these stores did 71.7% of all U.S. grocery sales.

Conventional supermarkets are still the largest in total numbers, although the 5,000 big conventionals and superstores are now doing 40% of all grocery business in the U.S.

Are some types of grocery formats more profitable than others? The answer is, yes, although research findings and conclusions vary.

Mr. Heller says superstores and warehouse stores are going to do the best business over-all; combination stores are going to do better than conventional supermarkets; conventionals are not going to be too impressive, and convenience stores are the best growth area for the future.

Income figures for 1982 show an average gross margin of 22.03% for all formats and average net profit of 0.88%, including taxes, according to Jack Cergol, communications manager with the Food Marketing Institute (FMI), Washington, one of the industry's trade associations. Mr. Cergol believes net profits will possibly grow to about 1% in 1983.

Those important shares

The key is (1) to sell more to each customer and (2) increase market share. Picking the right format is only one way to gain that share; others are increased services, merchandising and advertising.

Larger store size has seemed to be a way to increase sales for the past four decades or more. Safeway Stores has removed itself from the entire Omaha, Neb., area, at least in part because it had many older smaller stores and both Albertson's and Hinky Dinky were planning newer larger stores for the area. Taking a different approach in Washington, Safeway closed four stores in a relatively small area and opened one large superstore. But grocery analysts don't all agree about the inevitability of continued store ballooning. (See accompanying story on opposite page.)

What seems likely is that some superstores will go in here and there at denser population centers, junctions of interstates and urban freeways and the fringes of upscale-income population growth.

What is certain is that all these stores will be reaching out along the great midway of services, beckoning with more and better extras and niceties while beating the drum harder for merchandising and advertising.

Services are the way that su-

ning; now entire truckloads are taken from farms to the store and stacked in the first aisle. The concept remains the same: Buy in bulk, sell in bulk, eliminate unnecessary labor and pass the savings on to the customer.

In industry terms, Cub is still a super warehouse; but the "warehouse" has been deemphasized and the "super" has been stressed. Except for the fact that customers still have to bag their own groceries and wheel them out to their cars, shopping at Cub isn't much different than shopping anywhere else.

According to the "Competitive Edge," a monthly report published by Willard Bishop Consulting Economists, Barrington, Ill., warehouse stores and super warehouse stores combined, account for 7.2% of U.S. grocery stores sales.

"Every few months the lines of distinction between the warehouse and the conventional supermarket blur a bit more," says Timothy Murphy, who keeps tabs on the grocery industry for Willard Bishop. Mr. Murphy, who recently wrote a research report on Cub's success, says one of the keys to success in grocery marketing these days is change. "You can't remain stagnant in a stagnant market," Mr. Murphy says. "If you want to grow, you have to do things differently, because your increased sales have to come out of somebody else's hide."

In the Sunbelt, where supermarkets can sell more food simply because the population is growing, the warehouse concept is still a novelty. But in the Twin Cities, where population growth is flat, the conventional supermarket is fading.

Music and brightly painted decor enhance the . . .

One company, Red Owl, is busy selling its conventional supermarkets to independent operators. But Red Owl, a division of Wickes Cos., Santa Monica, Cal., is hanging on to its 39 Country Store warehouse units in the Midwest. Most of the Country Stores are conversions of conventional supermarkets.

Cub, a division of Super Valu stores. plans to replace three of its other Twin Cities stores with larger buildings this year. It has plans for more expansion in the Twin Cities and in other markets. Cub has six Twin Cities stores now, with seven other units in Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana.

Super Valu has phased itself out of grocery retailing, selling company-owned Super Valu stores to independent operators and continuing to supply those stores as a wholesaler, but the company will continue to operate some Cub stores and sell others to franchisees.

The proliferation of warehouse stores in the Twin Cities has not eliminated other formats. In suburban St. Louis Park, shoppers can bag their own groceries at a Country Store or cross the highway to a Byerly's superstore that has become a major tourist attraction. The Byerly's store, which sprawls across 92,000 sq. ft., includes a pharmacy, liquor store, restaurant, cooking school, chocolate shop, greeting card store and a gift shop, where one can spend a few thousand dollars on a grandfather clock.

. . . shopping experience at Cub warehouse stores.

Byerly's and the Country Store both continue to thrive—a tribute to their success at carving out a distinctive niche in an increasingly fragmented market. Indeed, Mr. Murphy's study detects warehouse shoppers' fierce loyalty.

Take, for example, Gordon Morris, an executive of a clothing store chain in the Twin Cities, who says he won't cross the street to Byerly's. "I think it's part of a plastic age," he says.

Like most of the Cub shoppers profiled, Mr. Morris shops for a family—his wife and two hungry sons—and is willing to bag his own groceries in exchange for saving money. His typical weekly grocery bill comes to $75 to $85—from $10 to $15 less he says than he would normally pay at a conventional supermarket.

"I felt somewhat inadequate packing up the boxes in the beginning," he says. "I thought I permarkets today can differentiate themselves from the competition, says Paul J. Reuter, president of Supermarket Insights, a New York-based company that makes on-location videotapes of grocery store operations for training and industry self-improvement. And that competition, he says, is coming increasingly from all other areas.

Store size and services are closely linked in considering any new grocery store design. The key consideration, says Timothy Murphy, an associate of Willard Bishop Consulting Economists, Barrington, Ill., is matching size to local need. "Historically the industry has developed prototypes and taken them into new areas with a cookie-cutter approach. But it costs a lot of money to start a new store."

Or as Tim Hammonds, FMI economist puts it: "Services and design really depend on local markets. You try to customize the mix of favorites to produce combinations that meet local needs. Grocery companies in the 1950s knew what kind of store to build. Supermarket operators today are finding the right mix of services."

More are added all the time, some of the newer being salad bars, automotive products, fresh pasta, financial services and, from Canada, bulk foods, dried beans, coffee and tea.

Convenience stores, too, are responding to customer demand for newer services. There are 51,150 of these stores in the U.S., and according to Kerly Le Boeuf, of the National Assn. of Convenience Stores, they "are in a trend of responding very rapidly to customer demand—for example, a lot of probing now of ATM [automatic teller machines] bank machines."

Meanwhile, merchandising is coming from the manufacturers as well as the stores. Chains supply some of their own, and now there is an added dimension, reports Mr. Murphy. "Stores are asking to see how well the suppliers will do for them. Historically the stores have taken what was offered. Now they're beginning to ask for merchandising in specific areas." The reason is clear. The right merchandising gives instant sales help, according to Tom Batey, president of Glendinning Associates, a marketing consultant company in Westport, Conn.

"A good merchandising display," says Mr. Batey "with products at the same price that's marked on the general shelving, can move groceries at four to eight times the normal rate, and with reduced prices, 10 times. With reduced prices, plus good advertising backup, plus a maximum merchandising effort, plus the right product—coffee or tuna fish, for example—we can move a year's volume in a week."

In supermarket advertising, one-stop shopping is a current strong selling point. Print will remain the No. 1 medium, in the opinion of Mr. Murphy, but some grocery companies also are getting into broadcast and experimenting with cable tv.

While the traditional print grocery advertising has had the flexibility to make changes up to within days or even hours of sale time, it is now being challenged by a new approach to tv commercial production. Mr. Batey reports that some specialized, retail-oriented tv ad agencies are helping grocers get into tv with the same flexibility as print. "These specialists," he reports, "have geared up the studio to shoot commercials with formated shots so that last-minute additions and deletions can be made."

Yet all grocery marketing in 1983 is much more than what is on the page or the screen. It is the store itself . . . perhaps the steel-shelved muscle and sinew and no-nonsense of the warehouse store but certainly the natural woods, soft lighting, and sparkling tile of the newest special-service stores.

And the way things look now, with the variety of store formats in the marketplace today, the choice is yours.

There's one for all*

- Conventional supermarkets: A self-service grocery store that offers a full line of groceries, meat and produce with at least $2 million in annual sales.
- Superstore: A modern, upgraded version of the conventional supermarket with at least 30,000 sq. ft. in total area and more than $8 million in annual sales. Offers an expanded selection of nonfoods and service departments (e.g. deli, bakery, seafood).
- Food and drug combo: Combination of a superstore and drugstore under a single roof and a common checkout. Drugstore merchandise represents at least one third of the selling area and a minimum of 15% of store sales.
- Warehouse store: A low-margin grocery store that combines reduced variety, lower service levels, less decor, streamlined merchandising presentation and aggressive prices.
- Super warehouse store: A high-volume hybrid format of the superstore and the warehouse store offering full variety, quality perishables and low prices.
- Limited-assortment store: A very "bare-bones," low-price grocery store that eliminates services and carries fewer than 1,000 items with few, if any, perishables.
- Convenience store: A small, higher-margin grocery store that offers an edited selection of staple groceries, nonfoods, and other convenience items, including carry-out foods and gasoline.

Sizing up the future

If the current trend toward bigger supermarkets continues, it's possible to imagine something approaching Chicago's McCormick Place or Houston's Astrodome in size—a whole city's groceries cum life-support services under one roof. But is the supermarket growth trend universal and irreversible?

Grocery industry observers vary in their analyses of the size question, as Advertising Age Magazine recently discovered:

- Jack Cergo, Food Marketing Institute: "I don't think grocery stores will continue across the board to grow larger and larger. The conventional supermarket isn't going to disappear. What we will see is a very gradual increase in size of the standard supermarket over the next several years—29,000 sq. ft. to 31,000 or 32,000 sq. ft. The average is now around 30,000 sq. ft., but local conditions can require variations from this."
- Ken Partch, Supermarket Business: "There will be a trend toward larger stores, as store trading areas grow larger. Whether this process will continue, I don't know. Developments in consumer needs and the kinds of stores offered them can create a different kind of vacuum. Conventional supermarkets of 15,000 sq. ft. to 20,000 sq. ft. are closing. Except in the Southeast, where nobody is building conventional supermarkets. An evolution to superstores, big drug combos, and super warehouse stores—with mixtures of each—is the direction we're going."
- Tim Murphy, Willard Bishop Consulting Economists Ltd.: "Grocery stores are getting larger, but the rate of increase is peaking. Many new stores built in 1983 are the same size (as predecessors) or just slightly larger. Many are about 30,000 sq. ft. although there may be plans for some up to 50,000 sq. ft. Kroger is building stores of 22,000 to 27,000 sq. ft. called Super-X Stores, which are combination drug and grocery stores."
- Paul J. Reuter, Supermarket Insights, a New York-based company that makes on-location videotapes for the industry: "The trend is to larger stores but not just by chains. Independents still have a good foothold with their larger units. Yes, the trend in chains is to superstores, such as Safeway's emphasis although it has several other types. Independents are now stressing two formats, superstores and warehouse—both regular warehouse and warehouse superstores such as Cub, Edwards and Pick 'n Save."

As for minimarkets, says Kerly Le Boeuf, National Assn. of Convenience Stores: "Convenience stores are not necessarily going to get bigger than they are. Average size has been about 2,400 sq. ft. for a long time. There are some super convenience stores of 3,500 to 5,000 sq. ft. and some smaller, 2,200 to 2,250 sq. ft."

Don't cry for U.S. shops in Argentina

By MARINA SPECHT

BUENOS AIRES—To most Americans, the image of Argentina is a country with an unstable economy, continuous currency devaluations and probably the last place an advertising agency would want to be in business.

To make matters worse, the antibusiness Peronist party is expected to sweep the elections on Oct. 30, raising the specter of a ban on advertising, which it imposed the last time it was in office.

But don't look for an exodus of U.S. agencies from Argentina, one of the largest advertising markets in Latin America. That's because their businesses are growing like topsy.

Half of Argentina's top 15 agencies—most of which are U.S.-owned or affiliated—expect to increase real (i.e., adjusted for inflation) billings by an average of 35% this year in local currency. And that's with an inflation rate that hit 30% last month.

The rest of the agencies are getting hit hard by the economic crunch, and some may be forced to close down.

"This year there'll be no in-betweens," says Horacio Diez, president of J. Walter Thompson de Argentina.

The growth of large agencies is exemplified by JWT, the No. 1 agency here with 1983 billings estimated at $22.8 million. "The agency's biggest achievement this year, " says Mr. Diez, "is that we increased our leadership over No. 2 by about 15%."

"Our clients are more aggressive, more optimistic and are launching new products," says Pablo Gowland, president of the agency of the same name, the sixth-largest in Argentina.

For example, in July, British American Tobacco's Nobleza Piccardo, one of Gowland's biggest clients, launched its Conway cigaret with about $2 million in billings.

Another marketer, Johnson & Johnson de Argentina, upped its ad budget by as much as 30% this year, says Mr. Gowland, who handles J&J's market-leading feminine hygiene products.

Also, J&J recently introduced Tylenol with a $1.5 million ad campaign, through Young & Rubicam de Argentina, and it plans to

Cathay Airways campaign may replace Michael York

Crain News Service

HONG KONG—Cathay Pacific Airways is launching the second phase of its Marco Polo campaign next year, which may mean dropping British actor Michael York, who plays the character of Marco Polo, according to one Cathay official.

Cathay's switch of its $7.5 million account to Leo Burnett Co. from Fortune (Far East) Ltd. was the biggest account switch in Asia last year (AA, Sept. 6, '82).

That move sounded the death knell for the Fortune Group, headquartered in Sydney, Australia, with offices in Hong Kong, Malaysia, Indonesia and Singapore, which had held the Cathay business for 22 years.

The Cathay campaign, which started in May, is built around a Marco Polo-like character, played in print and on tv by Mr. York, and the slogan, "The real traveler's way."

The campaign is designed to position Cathay as an airline for the business-class traveler.

Burnett won the account partly by promising a "big idea" campaign. But the campaign has been widely criticized by competing ad agency officials.

One criticism is that it uses an Englishman, Mr. York, to portray an Italian—Marco Polo—and that it reminds the Chinese population of the British control over Hong Kong as the colony is being turned over to the People's Republic of China (in 1997).

It took Marco Polo a lifetime to do what we do in a day.
"For the real traveller the world is getting bigger"

THE REAL TRAVELLERS WAY
CATHAY PACIFIC

The launch of Cathay Pacific Airways' campaign, via Leo Burnett Co., Hong Kong, is based on the story of Venetian world traveler Marco Polo.

A spokesman for the airline's advertising department conceded that since the change of agencies, "There seem to be a few problems."

But one top Burnett official said it was planned that the campaign would have multiple stages and "there is no indication that this campaign is not on a normal course."

Last month, Cathay and Burnett officials were locked in their regularly scheduled worldwide creative summit, this year held in Hong Kong.

The summit draws together the top creative resources of Burnett offices in Sydney, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Chicago and London. The airline's ad manager, Duncan Pring, also attended.

In another development, Jim Harris, head of the agency in Hong Kong for about a year, will leave in December to return to the agency's Australian office in a senior position. He will be replaced by Kerry Rubie, who already holds the position of regional manager for Asia and Japan.#

Colgate loss leaves D'Arcy lame

By DAGMAR MUSSEY
and HOWARD SHARMAN

DUESSELDORF—Following the loss of $40 million in Colgate-Palmolive billings worldwide, mostly in Europe, D'Arcy-MacManus & Masius is facing a massive rebuilding job with no Colgate replacement in view.

"If you elect to be in this league you have to be confident that in the long run you gain more than you lose," says Bert de Vos, D'Arcy chairman in London.

The agency originally gained the Colgate business through a London merger with another agency, and it was one of three multinational clients on which the European network is based.

So far, D'Arcy has announced no personnel cutbacks; sources say it is aiming for U.K. business from Beecham Products or Unilever's Elida Gibbs toothpaste and toiletries—recently resigned by Foote, Cone & Belding when it merged with NCK (AA, Aug. 29).

However, Beecham already is increasing its ties with Ogilvy & Mather and Grey Advertising, and Unilever uses J. Walter Thompson Co., O&M and SSCB:Lintas.

Sources at German agencies expect D'Arcy to go after either Henkel or a local account, like Blendax toothpaste, but are pessimistic about D'Arcy's chances.

"D'Arcy can't pick its clients," says one top German agency official. "It will have to take what the other big agencies leave over."#

New hurdle for FCB/NCK: FIRA

By MIKE DIEBERT

TORONTO—NCK Organization and Foote, Cone & Belding this week are facing a major hurdle to their worldwide merger plans: Canada's Foreign Investment Review Agency (AA, Aug. 29).

When FIRA, the government agency that can stop mergers and acquisitions that don't benefit the Canadian economy, begins taking evidence from the ad agencies, it is by no means certain that the government will approve the merger.

The two agencies must contend that the merger will not cut down competition (not likely to be a problem, since the new shop already has lost some business through client conflict), and that it could increase employment and use of Canadian goods and services.

NCK chairman Ed Roncarelli said that the agencies expect to increase their business by joining forces, but that the merged shop will not steamroll local agencies.

When asked what would happen if FIRA refuses the merger application, Mr. Roncarelli replied, "I haven't even thought about that."

Working against FIRA's approval is the fact that U.S. investment in this country has been politically unpopular throughout the administration of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau.

Also, in the past, these Canadian-U.S. mergers have not been automatically approved. Since FIRA came into being in 1976, it has stopped Wells, Rich, Greene from opening here and refused Kenyon & Eckhardt permission to buy a 40% stake in Grant/Tandy. Canadian-owned Vickers & Benson, to help N W Ayer get around FIRA, opened a division called V&B/Ayer. Since then the Ayer name has disappeared.

Campbell-Ewald managed to sidestep the FIRA requirement by opening in Toronto under federal incorporation as a subsidiary of the Interpublic Group of Cos., which already operates in Canada as parent of McCann-Erickson and SSC&B:Lintas.

When Saatchi & Saatchi linked with Compton Advertising, instead of opening its own office in Canada Saatchi set up a working agreement with Canadian-owned F.H. Hayhurst Co. to service British Airways.

Grey Advertising, which gained $8 million in billings of Canadian-owned Crombie Advertising in April, evaded probable FIRA objection by simply starting a new agency, Grey Ronalds Smith, and installing Crombie's owners as minority partners. Crombie then quietly was folded.

The basic policy has not changed, insists Charles Byron, FIRA's director of research and policy communications. "Canada has always welcomed foreign investment, provided it is of significant benefit," he says.

The only thing the two shops can count on getting is a quick answer, since the waiting time has been cut from 90 to 60 days.#

Yacht win sparks Aussie bonanza

By JUDITH MATHESON

SYDNEY—Australia II's victory in the America's Cup yacht race has sparked a bonanza for marketers and the media here.

Licensing of America's Cup-related products already is estimated to have generated $2.7 million in retail sales, and is increasing fast.

The West Australian government expects that with the 1987 challenge, in which a U.S. yacht is a likely contender to try to win back the cup, an extra $446.7 million will be generated by tourism in the state.

Australia II's biggest sponsor was Alan Bond's Bond Corp., owner of the Swan Lager brewing company in Western Australia and the department store chain Waltons Bond.

According to Swan's marketing manager, Terry Edmondson: "A golden opportunity like this doesn't come along often. . .Our strategy is to capitalize on the brand awareness. . .until the U.S. challenge in Perth in 1987."

The brewery has released a commemorative Swan lager can with a picture of the Swan lager spinnaker. Swan ran full-page ads in major metropolitan newspapers and export markets in Singapore and the U.K., and tv spots appeared in Western Australia.

Swan began exporting its lager beer to the U.S. during the race and is considering stepping up the exports (AA, Oct. 3).

On the morning of the victory, Waltons Bond mounted a huge "fighting" kangaroo, complete with red boxing gloves, atop its main Sydney store. The company expects strong sales of flags, kangaroo replicas and t-shirts.

The leading outdoor board company, Australian Posters, another of the yacht's sponsors, created a board in Perth with a picture of the cup overflowing and the slogan "Our cup runneth over."

At the Sydney offices of the largest Australian-owned ad agency, Monahan Dayman Adams, a sign bearing the cup proclaimed "Australian owned. MDA—we're Aussie, too."

Qantas Airlines, which will be bringing the cup back to Australia, also is planning a special promotion.

BBDO takes new tack in Europe

By DENNIS CHASE

NEW YORK—BBDO International, which for years has been active in buying minority shares of agencies around the world, has modified that approach to gain more pan-European business.

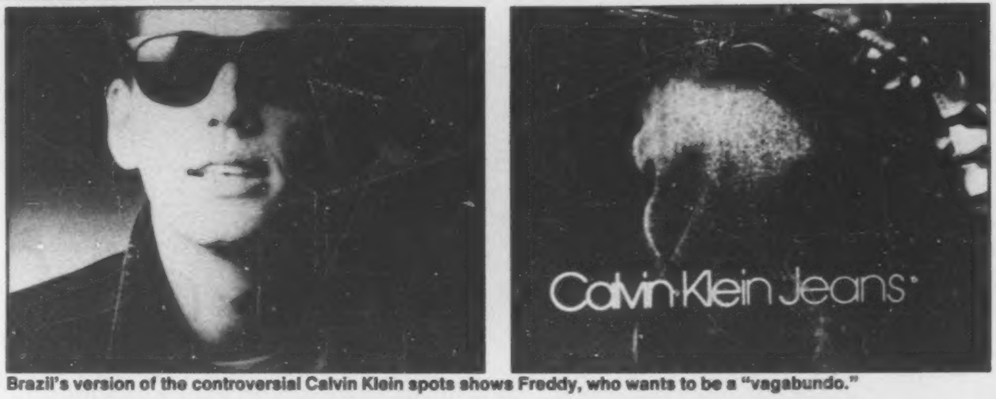
Late last month Willi Schalk, BBDO's international president, set up a new full-service agency, BBDO International, in London.

The new agency will "demonstrate our commitment. . .to the development of pan-European business," he said.

The agency, with Bill Wilson, now international exec vp, as managing director, is starting with unspecified billings from Gillette Co. BBDO owns a minority share of its main London agency, SJIP/BBDO.

The key to BBDO's unusual move is the growing importance of London as a center for decisions about pan-European and pan-Middle East ad campaigns.

"It's a different kind of business compared with local accounts," says Mr. Schalk. "We wanted a separate organization with different staffing and orientation."#



Brazil's version of the controversial Calvin Klein spots shows Freddy, who wants to be a "vagabundo."

Brazil bans Calvin jean ad

By LAUREL WENTZ

SAO PAULO—Calvin Klein's latest ad campaign here might outdo the controversial U.S. commercials that inspired it.

A commercial by the jeans marketer was taken off Brazilian tv late last month, after just three days on the air.

Like the campaign in the U.S., the Brazilian commercials consist of young people talking about themselves and their lives, without mention of the advertised product, before a final shot of the jeans or sportswear the subject is wearing.

The banned Brazilian commercial stars young Freddy, who says his mother brought him up well, "but it doesn't work; what I really want is to be a vagabundo." He dons a pair of punk-like dark glasses with a happy sneer.

The commercial is "a pernicious influence on young people," charged both a government office that oversees tv and the Advertising Self Regulatory Council.

But Brazilian authorities have not touched another three Calvin commercials.

Executives at Calvin Klein's Brazilian agency, Fischer & Justus, are puzzled but delighted by their sudden notoriety. They gleefully promise a second flight of four commercials this month "more shocking than the first."

"I'm not telling young people to use drugs or beat up their parents," says agency creative director Eduardo Fischer.

"We're preparing a big bomb," Mr. Fischer says of the commercials to follow. In one, Freddy asks, "Do you like my eyes? My ears? My smile?" Then he shouts, "I don't feel like pleasing anybody." Freddy then sticks out his tongue and makes a horrible face.

To further needle his critics, Mr. Fischer plans to shoot a new beginning, with Freddy saying, "Some people didn't like my commercial. So we made another one."

Calvin Klein's Brazilian marketing manager, Clovis Lopes, estimates the designer has captured, in little more than one year in Brazil, 25% to 30% of the designer jeans market, formerly dominated by Pierre Cardin and Yves St. Laurent.#

Airlines may suspend Brazil service

SAO PAULO—International airlines reportedly are considering a possible suspension of international air service to Brazil if the government does not allow airlines to remit earnings back to their U.S. home offices.

The move comes in the midst of the Brazil ad industry's worsening tailspin. The biggest ad market in Latin America has scrapped its 5% billings growth forecast this year in favor of a more realistic forecast of a slight drop in billings.

Meanwhile, Brazil's Central Bank—the sole agent for all foreign exchange transactions—is sitting on more than $30 million from 20 international airlines.

The airlines—unable to discover if they will be able to get their money out—have made veiled threats about cutting service.

American Airlines ended its flights to Brazil in mid-September, leaving Pan American World Airways the only U.S. carrier with Brazil routes.

Meanwhile, the Brazilian government has forced supermarkets not to raise prices of basic foods and cleaning supplies for at least one month.

Supermarket operators are shaken by the looting in recent weeks of hundreds of supermarkets and grocery stores by hungry Brazilians in Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo. In further signs of growing Brazilian unrest, Molotov cocktails were hurled at the U.S. consulate in Sao Paulo, and unemployed workers are living in tents in Sao Paulo's largest park.#—L.W.

Don't cry for U.S. ad agencies

expand its baby products line, some products of which have a 90% market share in Argentina.

"You stop watching tv for a week and when you come back there'll be two new commercials on the air," says Roberto Forero, president of Leo Burnett Co., the 13th-largest agency in the country.

In Burnett's case, this strange theory is certainly true. The agency picked up $2 million of new business this year from Braun appliances and Citibank and expects to double its billings this year.

David Ratto, president of David Ratto Advertising, affiliated with BBDO International, says, "As long as the recession continues, we will see a concentration of accounts in the hands of the most professional, efficient and serious ad agencies."

His agency, which was hurt by the loss of R.J. Reynolds Industries' Camel account last May, won the $850,000 Volkswagen Argentina's Gacel launch last month.

The confidence of the ad industry stands in sharp contrast to the country's economic chaos.

Although there are still three weeks to go before the crucial elections, an end-of-term atmosphere already has blanketed the country. Millions of workers, from teachers to garbage collectors, are going on strike on an almost weekly basis, paralyzing vast sectors of the economy.

Businessmen predict that the inflation rate may soon reach the 54%-a-month level that was recorded in 1976, immediately after the downfall of Isabel de Peron's government.

Although Juan Domingo Peron's widow has not returned from exile in Spain, the Peronists remain the favorites to win the elections, according to the latest polls (AA, July 18).

If the Peronists win, and ban advertising as they did in 1964, then all bets are off. But so far the industry is confident that an ad ban won't happen.

"This country has seen economic chaos and political instability for the past 30 years," says Ricardo de Luca, president of an agency with the same name. He believes that "the advertising industry has become somewhat immune to all the sickness surrounding it and will survive."

Survival is what six medium-size agencies had in mind this year when they formed a media-buying pool called Espacios. The pool places ads for a 10% commission, instead of the regular 15%, because it gets volume discounts from the media.

Federico Ortiz, president of Ortiz, Scopesi & Cia. (part of Ogilvy & Mather International) says that it's largely thanks to Espacios, which he joined, that his agency expects to bill $13.9 million this year, "a 60% improvement over last year's billings."

According to Mr. Ortiz, "the key to survival in a market as unpredictable as this is to have as many clients as possible for many different sectors, since the one thing you don't have here is continuity."

Unpredictability is what agencies faced last week when the government announced it was banning imports and the purchase of foreign currency. That has thrown all forecasts out of whack again.

"Anything can happen to an agency this year in Argentina, from closing down to doubling billings," says Mr. Forero, who is taking over the Burnett office in Brazil.#

In wake of MGM/UA's move to WRG

Fox may exit JWT

By BOB MARICH

Los Angeles—The Hollywood advertising scene, tranquil for several years, is suddenly erupting with a vengeance.

The fireworks started last week when MGM/UA Entertainment named Wells, Rich, Greene, onetime agency for Columbia Pictures, to handle its $35 million-plus advertising account, effective Jan. 5.

WRG succeeds Diener/Hauser/Bates, which is also the agency for Paramount Pictures.

The attendant executive moves connected with that development have prompted 20th Century-Fox Pictures to initiate quietly an agency review of its own, Advertising Age has learned.

Fox executives were unavailable for comment on its agency situation.

Fox, which spends over $50 million, is with J. Walter Thompson Co.'s Entertainment group.

"Thompson may keep the account," said one source. "But Fox now finds that the key people that were the reason it went with the agency in the first place are no longer there."

The reason is that two key executives are now in the MGM/UA camp.

Things haven't been so up in the air in Hollywood since early 1980. In rapid-fire succession at that time, Universal Pictures nabbed Doyle Dane Bernbach from Fox, which selected JWT Entertainment as a replacement. Columbia named Needham, Harper & Steers/USA to succeed WRG, which has been without a movie account until now.

WRG has set up an entertainment division to service MGM/UA, and named as its president

FTC nearing a new 'deception' stance

By RICHARD L. GORDON

Washington—The role of the "reasonable consumer" is said to be a key sticking point as Federal Trade Commission members try to agree on new criteria to define more narrowly the kinds of deceptive advertising practices that will be challenged in the future.

"We're treading through a minefield of past decisions," according to FTC commissioner David Clanton, who proposed the project after Congress balked at FTC chairman James Miller's efforts to have a definition of "deception" added to the Federal Trade Commission Act.

"We're not yet at agreement, but we're closer," commissioner Clanton said of the internal bargaining that's been under way inside FTC. "That's the accomplishment," he said, recalling that the FTC members were split widely on the issue only a year ago.

The new document under preparation at FTC is said to run well beyond 15 pages and include references to 50 or more past ad cases as guidance for FTC lawyers and advertisers on what the commission believes is the proper approach to determining deception.

Mr. Clanton, whose term at FTC expired Friday before the project could be completed, in an interview spelled out three major areas of dispute:

- The so-called "reasonable" standard, which holds that an ad claim would be deceptive only if it misleads consumers acting "reasonably" under the circumstances. Though discussion about "reasonable" interpretations of ad claims often appears in FTC cases, the commission has not bound itself explicitly to that principle. Nor has their been general agreement inside FTC that a "reasonableness" standard would not hinder FTC's

Bitterness airs at Ogilvy trial

By GAY JERVEY

New York—An acrimonious atmosphere pervaded the courtroom here last week when Ogilvy & Mather's top creative executive, Norman Berry, took the stand in the trial of a sex discrimination case filed by two female employes against the agency.

Mr. Berry, exec vp, was questioned by Judith Vladek of Vladek Waldman, Elias & Engelhard, on the manner in which an employe working in another area of the agency could transfer into an entry-level position in the creative department.

One of the complainants, Jane Zukofsky, a broadcast department employe, had attempted such a transfer on three separate occasions and was turned down each time.

During the questioning of Mr. Berry, Judge Lee Gagliardi chastised attorneys for both sides for their apparent inability to camouflage bitter feelings, and on their use of snide remarks and comments. Referring to a "spillover of personal animosity," the judge asserted firmly and with a raised voice, "I don't like it and it's not

Alberto's split 30s add ABC

By CRAIG REISS

New York—ABC-TV this week will join its rival networks in accepting Alberto-Culver Co.'s controversial 30-second commercials advertising two unrelated products.

The decision by ABC to accept the experimental spots through the fourth quarter of 1983 is a change in the network's policy on unrelated-product messages in the same 30-second commercial pod.

Last summer, ABC had taken split 30-second spots from Alberto-Culver and Ralston Purina Co., but those spots had promoted similar products.

Purina had advertised both dog and cat foods in split 30s on ABC, while Alberto-Culver had run split commercials for haircare products.

NBC last summer became the first network to accept split 30s for unrelated products, to stave off legal challenges.

CBS followed suit, but required advertisers to begin the commercial with a corporate identification and to run a bridge between the two sales messages.

The practice of taking split 30s received considerable attention at the recent Assn. of National Advertisers convention in Hot Springs, Va. (AA, Oct. 10).

Many advertisers object to the practice because they fear it will worsen clutter on network tv, and ultimately pave the way for the 15-second spot becoming the standard unit.

But Leonard H. Lavin, chairman of Alberto-Culver, said he is not pushing for the 15-second unit.

"These commercials are not necessarily two 15-second spots," Mr. Lavin said. "They could be a 10 and a 20. It could be 24 seconds and six seconds, as far as I'm concerned."

The executive insisted that the point is that more than one product should be able to be advertised within the 30-second pod. His company has long advocated that.

Jake Keever, vp in charge of sales at ABC, said: "We are going to begin accepting the Alberto nonrelated-product spots on an experimental basis. At the end of the fourth quarter, we will decide whether or not to continue with them."

Mr. Keever said that other advertisers, whom he declined to identify, had approached ABC about running split 30s for nonrelated products.#

Prognosis bodes well for a steady recovery

By Jack Hafferkamp

A year ago in these pages—on Page M-9 of the Oct. 25 issue, to be exact—many in the magazine industry expressed serious concern that the 1980s would be a time of troubled transition for magazines, that the great growth era of special interest magazines—and thus, the entire magazine industry—might be coming to a halt. A combination of economic, demographic and psychographic factors, plus the expansion of alternative media, signaled slower growth for successful magazines and death for those caught short in the inevitable "shakeout and consolidation."

Jack Hafferkamp teaches "The Magazine" at Roosevelt University in Chicago. He is also a communications consultant with Chicago-based Nexus Inc.

Those thoughts matured during a mostly dismal year that followed two other recession-flattened years. Today, flush from generally substantial third and fourth quarter advertising page increases, as well as reassurances from a recent New York Times article and other sources that "Americans seem to be doing as much reading as ever," the magazine industry is considerably more bullish.

"No doubt about it, magazines are a growth industry," says John Veronis of New York-based Veronis, Suhler and Associates, investment banker in communications and publishing. "This industry is extraordinarily healthy. I believe you will find as many opportunities for magazines in the next 10 years as in the last 10."

Mr. Veronis is not alone in this assessment. In fact, the euphoria is widespread, despite continued belief that the 1980s are indeed a time of transition. There is a recognition that not all segments of the industry are sharing in the recovery and a growing awareness that there are probably significant cost increases not too far down the road to economic recovery. Clearly something has prompted publishers and industry observers to dig out their smile buttons and reevaluate the nature of the transition.

Revived business certainly has played a part in changing attitudes. "Media Industry Newsletter" (MIN) reports that through September, 63.7% of the 135 magazines it tracks have increased ad pages and that some—notably Geo, Venture, Esquire and Atlantic—are up sharply. Elsewhere, statistics show (AA, Aug. 8) sharp third and projected fourth quarter ad page gains for women's magazines, particularly Working Woman, Glamour, McCall's, Mademoiselle and Woman's Day, as well as other consumer publications: New York, Success, Omni, Redbook and Gentlemen's Quarterly.

To be genuine, however, the industry's newfound enthusiasm must be based on more than a good 1983. It depends on a shared sense that economic recovery is here to stay and that magazine readership is not going to fall significantly in the foreseeable future. New enthusiasm also depends on an emerging confidence that the competitive climate for national advertising dollars will warm to magazines as advertisers turn away from less and less effective network television.

In fact, network tv's declining audience share has become a magazine industry rallying cry. The Magazine Publishers Assn. in New York has made it the focus of a $2 million campaign. Its theme is "Magazines reach people you can't get through ordinary channels," and its aim is to establish clearly in advertisers' minds that the networks have been raising rates at the same time that their total share of the prime time audience has fallen from 95% in 1975 to an MPA-estimated 75% in 1983. A similar trend is apparent in daytime viewing patterns. Says the MPA, "The day of the blanket

The sisters get older, wiser and tougher

By Joanne Cleaver

Jan, 32, owns her own home in an affluent Chicago suburb. She is a wife, mother and a doctoral candidate—in short, the reader every women's magazine wants to reach and claims to have a hold on.

Jan has one problem with women's magazines: "They all look the same. They all have the same articles on being fulfilled, handling your money and redecorating your house with plastic milk cartons."

What she's noticing is a recent phenomenon in women's magazines. While they all claim to fill a unique niche, they're also encroaching on each other's territory—so much so that their covers often look suspiciously similar.

Inside, women's magazines do have different flavors, but not the ones you might expect. Plain vanilla service magazines such as Family Circle and Ladies' Home Journal are developing a more investigative approach to controversial issues.

Formerly militant magazines such as New Woman are including fashion, beauty and food.

Redbook, long a fiction showcase, just eliminated its novelette.

McCall's just ended its short-lived "Right Now" section, while Woman's Day has added a "Quick! Quick!" news and service bulletin board.

What all these changes have in common is publishers' desires to catch up—and stay caught up—with women today. That the magazines are changing isn't news in itself—as editors of the oldest ones immediately point out—but the way they're doing it is news.

For years, the so-called seven sisters—Family Circle, Good Housekeeping, Woman's Day, McCall's, Ladies' Home Journal, Redbook and Better Homes and Gardens—were the women's magazines.

They considered themselves a comfortable, curl-up-in-bed blend of advice, food, fashion, crafts and decorating projects. Sometimes celebrity profiles were added for spice.

Family Circle, well known as a woman's service magazine, has updated its graphics over the years. But it has also begun to tackle more controversial issues. All of the "seven sisters" are beginning to rethink their roles in light of today's woman and her changing interests.

They did run serious articles on women's roles, child raising and current topics of debate. But until magazines like Ms. and Working Woman popped up, the traditional seven pretty much kept the status quo.

Analysts were predicting the demise of traditional women's magazines before the end of the 1970s.

Declining circulations and ad revenues were the most obvious problems, but an even bigger threat came from the new magazines that siphoned off the youngest, most affluent and loyal readers.

That was over 10 years ago. Now, says New York-based magazine consultant Peter Jacobi, "everyone has come to realize that woman is a multisplendored creature who isn't a homebody, but a business body, a sports body and a mind."

Redbook is perhaps the prime example of a straying sister getting her act together.

Just last year, circulation and revenues were faltering badly. In a time when women want facts and options clearly and simply presented, Redbook's reputation rested on its fiction—then at least three short stories each month and a novelette. "Relevant" issues weren't given in-depth treatment. Graphics treatment was uneven at times.

"Redbook was in trouble," says current publisher Allen Waxenberg.

Then Hearst Corp. bought the magazine from Charter Publish-

Between (editorial) fathers and daughters

Editor's note: What other changes can we expect from women's magazines? Advertising Age Magazine spoke with Herbert Mayes, a retired magazine editor and his daughter, Alexandra Mayes, currently managing editor of Seventeen, to get a cross-generational point of view.

Herbert Mayes, 83, has spent his entire professional life in publishing. For 20 years he was editor of Good Housekeeping. That was followed by several years as editor of McCall's. He worked with such writers as W. Somerset Maugham and Daphne du Maurier, publishing some of the best in American journalism and fiction. He is still an active observer of the industry.

Alexandra Mayes, 42, has been managing editor of Seventeen for 3½ years. Before that she spent 19 years at Glamour. She says of life with her father, "I got magazines with my pablum. The one trait I share with my father is that I never wanted to do anything else but work on a magazine."

Magazine: How is the role of women's magazines changing—what do readers expect nowadays?

Mr. Mayes: The role of a women's magazine hasn't changed too much from the days when Sarah Josepha Hale was editor of Godey's Lady's Book in the 1800s. Her magazine dealt with cooking, personal grooming, marriage problems—no sex. And basically, women's magazines have adhered to that formula. The major change, though, is the diminution of the authority of the editors. [When I was editor] editors mattered, not publishers. Now their authority is lessened. They don't have the authority over whom they hire, where they're going to travel, how much they're going to pay.

Ms. Mayes: The major thing is that starting as early as the teens, women believe that all doors are open to them—they can do anything they choose. Women are interested in everything these days. There's such a thing as overspecialization. Young women and older ones still want basic how-tos simply because they have so much more to manage. Those magazines that have continued success are those that address more than one topic.

Magazine: Are women more or less influenced by what they read today—in other words, are they more skeptical and discerning, or do they tend to run to women's magazines for "real answers?"

Mr. Mayes: I certainly do think the readers of Good Housekeeping believe in Good Housekeeping. [It is] far and away the best women's magazine. There's no magazine that compares with it in kind and extent of service material.

There used to be the big six: Pictoral Review, McCall's, Good Housekeeping, Women's Home Companion, Ladies' Home Journal and Delineator. It was a different era. People looked to them for marvelous fiction, not that sappy stuff that's based on the romance books that are so popular today.

Ms. Mayes: I think they have more influence than they did, because they cover more than ever before. The difference is that they don't dictate, they offer guidelines. Women are too smart to be dictated to. They turn to different magazines for different information. There is no one magazine for all women. I look to a variety of magazines, and I think that other women do. I think it's great that a magazine like Good Housekeeping has maintained home and family life [as its focus] and still gives you up-to-date medical advice.

Magazine: What kinds of issues—life style, moral, political, etc.—should women's magazines focus on today? What issues are passe or irrelevant?

Mr. Mayes: If I were called in by one of the magazines today—a fantastic notion at my age—I wouldn't concentrate as heavily on sex. It's not my cup of tea. When I was editor, men and women knew what to do. I don't know what I would concentrate on. It's whatever would hold my readers spellbound.

Ms. Mayes: There is no issue or topic that isn't relevant to women. In addition to life style and politics, women are still interested in looking good and feeling good.

The treatment of a topic is what keeps it fresh. "What to do if your boyfriend kisses you goodnight" may seem irrelevant now, but it has given way to "Sex and Your Body." The subject itself isn't new but it's how you present it. With all the subjects around today, it's still wonderful to think that family, friends, boyfriends and good looks are still important.

Magazine: What kinds of changes in the editorial content and format of women's magazines do you think we will see in the next couple years? Can you make any predictions?

Mr. Mayes: The only one whose future I would guarantee is Good Housekeeping. [Otherwise] I think there will be fewer.

Ms. Mayes: Service vs. value based on time vs. money. Magazines like Seventeen have more service than ever before.

There's an increasing change in family life styles; the family unit as we've known it in this country no longer exists. So the emotional changes will make readers look for information on how to handle it. There'll be a greater emphasis on how women balance their lives, both professional and personal. But I hope that magazines are entertaining to readers; it can't be all gloom. Women want to laugh even more because of their responsibilities.

Tougher

ing Co. and made sweeping changes.

The results have been startling. Annette Capone, the new editor-in-chief, says the first issue completely planned by her new staff—June 1983—sold 25% more on the newsstand than the previous month's.

Redbook is calling itself the only magazine that a young working mother needs to find out what she has to know to keep on top of her job, family, and home.

About 30 pages in every issue were freed up simply by dropping the novelette. (Plans call for the magazine to concentrate on short stories instead.)

An expanded 48-page editorial well is being filled with twice as much fashion, beauty and food as the magazine used to have. Columns on health, pregnancy and entertaining join well established monthly columns written by sex therapists and child development specialists.

One new approach is a cluster of articles on a particular topic—the advantages of being a single mother, for instance.

The keynote article is written in straight reporting fashion—the way Time might write it, says Ms. Capone—and is accompanied by a first-person account of the experience and several short how-to articles.

"I think we've always done these things [tackled real issues]," says Ms. Capone. "Redbook does have a reputation for dealing with these things. But we've increased the service areas to balance."

Redbook's problems haven't gone unnoticed by its sisters. But while they're critically examining themselves to be sure they're meeting their readers' needs, they also maintain that, to a large degree, their readers still want the traditional mixture.

Lenore Hershey, former editor-in-chief of Ladies' Home Journal, now a New York communications consultant and author of "Between the Covers," the history of LHJ, recounts this anecdote: Before addressing a meeting of a financial women's association, she was surprised. "They are all in jobs that women weren't in 20 years ago," she says. "I was afraid they wouldn't hear me, that I wouldn't connect with them."

Then she sat down with six of the association members for breakfast before her speech. "What they were talking about was divorce and babysitters," she says. "The so-called sweatless women I was afraid of all have the same questions and problems we all do.

"The point is that the woman of today addresses eternal questions as well as current ones."

Thus, there is a continuing market for a magazine that does cover a wide variety of topics, all of which touch on areas of concern for most women. The difference today is that the magazines no longer take it for granted that they're delivering what their readers want.

Woman's Day, for example, is starting to include one major journalistic article in every issue "in a subject area you wouldn't expect us to cover," such as gun control, says Peter Diamandis, group publisher and vp at CBS Publications, which owns the magazine.

He'll be excerpting more from major books, both fiction and nonfiction, as well. "We have an enormous editorial budget here and we're going after the big ones," he says.

WD's major competitor at the checkout line, Family Circle, owned by the New York Times Co., has discovered the same thing. Along with a graphic facelift, FC is putting more guts in its writing, says editor-in-chief Arthur Hettich. Readers demand more facts than they did 10 years ago, whether it's an article on decorating a mobile home or on juvenile delinquents.

Both WD and FC have added short bulletin-board type sections for quick recipes, crafts and news briefs.

"They aren't seven sisters anymore. They're individualists," says Ms. Hershey.

The funny thing is that while the seven sisters are gathering up their skirts and wading into the competitive fray, the special interest and life-style magazines of the 1970s are redefining themselves as service magazines. They shun the "life style" label, claiming that they're broadening their editorial content to appeal to all, or many, aspects of a woman's life (sound familiar?).

Redbook's covers have undergone fine-tuning each year since 1981 (far left). Inside, other changes are evident: Fiction has given way to more relevant issues.

" 'Service magazine' has been a perjorative term because service magazines are going downhill," says Verne Westerberg, publisher of Conde Nast Publications' Self. "But now they're imitating the direction Self went in."

Self was started five years ago to capitalize on the physical fitness craze, but quickly expanded its focus to include mental and emotional well being, too.

Editor-in-chief Phyllis Starr Wilson says the traditional magazines have a harder time changing because they don't want to alienate their older readers while attracting new ones. With a median reader age of 29, Self's readers already do a lot of changing.

"We have a strong 'how-to' slant, which I consider service. But we're not giving them 10,000 recipes," she adds.

Working Mother, which had 28.1% circulation growth in 1982 from 1981, according to the latest annual Folio survey of the top 400 magazines, started out as a one-time spinoff from McCall's. It also considers itself a service magazine, according to editor-in-chief Vivian Cadden.

"We think of working motherhood as not a life style, but the way an enormous number of young women live," she says.

Obviously, issues such as child care take up a lot of editorial space in Working Mother, but the magazine also includes some wry twists on problems and feelings most mothers face every day.

One column is titled "The Guilt Department," and another, "It's Weird, But It Works For Us," runs first-person accounts of unusual but practical solutions to common problems.

A major shift in emphasis and image has pushed another magazine, Glamour, into the forefront of the new breed of service magazines.

In 1968, a total 68% of Glamour's editorial was devoted to fashion and beauty. Today, those categories claim only 38%.

The rest of the space is devoted to articles on money, electronics, Washington news and cars. Editor-in-chief Ruth Whitney is universally acclaimed for taking a cream puff magazine buy for television is over."

Wes Silk, publisher of Better Homes and Gardens, says, "People are finally beginning to realize that you can't do the whole job of advertising on tv, that you have to find a way to get at this upscale, intelligent working woman and that the way to do it is magazines."

The decline of the networks' audience share reflects the emergence of cable tv. Yet cable has not firmly established itself as a dominant advertising medium. Chicago-based publishing consultant Bernard Gordon believes that the "biggest problem cable is having now is not simply a matter of attracting viewers. Its problem is in providing enough programing for specialized stations to retain viewers."

Evidence is growing that cable tv and magazines may have complementary, as well as competitive, relationships. Reader's Digest's recent study of the Tulsa, Okla., market traced the readership of 15 magazines in homes with network tv only, with basic cable and with pay cable. One major conclusion was that homes with pay cable tend to receive the most magazines and basic cable homes take more magazines than noncable homes.

"We're trying to learn about what's happening to people who watch tv," explains John Nephew, the Digest's advertising research director. "We want to know if they really are watching it. We're working to demonstrate that advertisers may not be getting everything they think they're getting with network tv. We don't think we're going to replace it, but we want advertisers to know that the Digest is a good supplement." Mr. Nephew says the Tulsa study showed him that "people who take pay cable tend to be heavy consumers of all media."

Over the last score of years the consumer magazine field has seen the demise of general interest publications that couldn't adapt to changing reader interests and the explosion of magazines devoted to special interests such as Runner's World, Soap Opera Digest and Byte. Generally the blame for this state of affairs is laid at the door of network tv. Often overlooked, however, is network tv's role in creating the climate that has led to the emergence of today's special interest publications.

Tv has heightened national awareness of faraway places, of other cultures and other life styles, of science, of sports and things as diverse as home remodeling and guerrilla warfare. Tv arouses curiosity, yet because it is such a mass medium, it is generally unable to satisfy the craving for the deeper knowledge it has generated. For more information people have turned in great numbers to magazines. Mr. Veronis believes that cable may contribute to even greater magazine readership because the more the newer medium specializes, the more it will arouse viewers' appetites for specialized information.

Magazines will be able to cater to this demand better than tv because, as Mr. Gordon puts it, "to become an on-going success, a magazine needs only a relatively small slice of the total society." Magazines can succeed in a highly segmented society precisely because they are able to "narrowcast" rather than broadcast. They have become storehouses of increasingly specialized information delivered to involved, committed, increasingly segmented readers.

Categories of magazines often singled out for rapid expansion in the coming years include business, home, health/diet/fitness and computer-related. The last group is surprising, mostly because there already are so many computer titles available —more than 70 according to the MPA. Last year it was reasonable to wonder out loud if the computer-related field wasn't already saturated: How many computer magazines can people read? And by extension, pessimists wondered if the entire consumer magazine field hadn't come dangerously close to segmenting itself to death.

This year Mr. Veronis offers a more sanguine view. "I can recall a number of years ago," he says, "when somebody said to me, 'The market for medical magazines has now been saturated.' Yet they are still growing in number today because there are so many marketing opportunities in that area. You can say the same thing about the computer-related field. As long as interest in the field continues to grow and diversify, there is no way that the magazine market can be saturated by existing product. Wherever a market develops, so will a magazine."

In this environment, even the biggest, most successful mass circulation publications must stay in very close touch with reader interests, practices and preferences. If they do not, they will lose readers very quickly.

"We have tons of subscriber research," says Mr. Silk of Better Homes and Gardens. "We know what's on their minds and we're staying with them. We do it with all kinds of mailings and inserts that ask questions. We solicit recipes, building ideas, whatever we need to stay abreast. We know we have to change as the audience changes."

Mr. Silk says his staff often shares its ideas on the readers with Better Homes advertisers. "We have roundtables," says Mr. Silk, "to discuss areas of common concern."

This highly specific knowledge of both reader interests and advertiser needs allows Better Homes to put out from 130 to 150 editions per month, with advertising in each edition shaded toward a specific geographic or demographic segment of the total circulation. This practice is now common to many magazines, from the large circulation newsweeklies to such highly specialized publications as Farm Journal.

Magazines are refining their approaches to giving readers what they want and, at the same time, minding the relationship between advertising and editorial functions. Advertising and editorial have to work closer now, explains George Green, The New Yorker's president and chief operating officer. "You can lose a lot more money a lot faster now than in years past," he says. "And that has changed qualitatively the way we look at the industry. It's the difference between losing walking-around money and millions. It means that editors generally have to pay much more attention to business decisions."

Mr. Green is a confirmed optimist, yet his comment points to at least one large dark cloud on the horizon: The dangers of increased costs. Eric Edelmann, senior consultant with New York-based Strategic Futures, is completing a study of consumer magazine trends through 1988 for Printing Industries of America. "I'm finding," he says, "that the publishers paint a lot rosier picture of the future than the supply side folks. Publications will be facing cost increases across the board for everything needed to carry a book from concept to the marketplace. And in the short term I don't see any increased production efficiencies capable of absorbing increased costs."

The extent of the impact of increased costs would vary from magazine to magazine. Those growing the fastest would be the least bothered by increased cost. Of course, not all magazines are doing well. The New Yorker, according to "MIN" figures, is down about 13% in total ad pages so far this year. Playboy is down 20%, Scientific American is down 25% and House and Garden, down 29%. We may not need to take up a collection for these magazines yet, but their situation clearly points out that magazines are especially vulnerable today to cost/profit squeezes. This vulnerability would become greater if accelerated inflation were to accompany the recovery.

"In that situation," says Mr. Edelmann, "large circulation publications would lose ground very quickly. While their costs go up continually, they [publishers] can raise prices to subscribers only once a year."

Clearly then, magazines face a double challenge in the 1980s. They must not only reposition themselves vis-a-vis cable and network tv to increase ad page revenues, but they must find new economies in production and distribution. "Thity-five per cent of our costs are manufacturing related," says Mr. Green, "and I think that magazine production improvements will be to the 1980s what computerized circulation was to the 1970s. We're looking to reduce the costs of printing plates and the film for advertisers. Soon everyone will be breaking out sections routinely, using automated bindery lines to produce one magazine for you because you like skiing and one for me because I like golf. As more and more is known about each person in a household, the more he or she will be advertised to directly."

Additionally, if postal costs climb too rapidly, magazines still have to stop talking about alternate delivery systems and begin using them. Publishers must also look to selling more of the product they put on newsstands. Currently, 50% newsstand sales is considered successful in the industry, but increasing costs may prompt a reevaluation.

Is the new enthusiasm for the magazine industry really justified? Since last year, not only has the recovery asserted itself, but publishers and advertisers have had another 12 months to observe the environment of the 1980s.

Today they have a clearer view that cable tv will continue to absorb network viewers, that videogames will come and go, that the pace of everyday life may continue to speed up as a result of the information explosion and that no matter what happens to the other media, magazines will not disappear from our lives.

The fact is, people like to read magazines. They are a pleasurable, efficient medium for absorbing detailed information. Publishers always have known this, but perhaps they needed the recovery to nudge their memories. Right now, when they look into the future they see that magazines can survive and grow. The primary competition will come from the other magazines and not necessarily other media in the fight for a slice of survival pie.

Value of raising brand quality played down

PHILADELPHIA—Does it pay to upgrade brand quality?

Not really, a report by Consumer Network, a consulting and research company here, indicates.

Most consumers do not readily associate any brands with good quality, and top management greatly overestimates the brand quality associations made by consumers, Consumer Network reports.

The report, "Brand Quality Perceptions: In Search of Good Stuff," also found that marketers are planning for more extensive brand quality upgrading over the next five years than consumers are willing to pay for.

The report is based on responses of 635 regionally and demographically representative Consumer Network shopper panelists who were surveyed in April and May.

It also includes July responses from 12 chief executive officers of major consumer product companies and followup interviews with 25 panelists.

Most of the panelists were unable to think of either good or poor-quality brands in any product category, Consumer Network reports. But those who did associate brands with product quality were far more likely to make brand associations with good quality than with poor quality.

"The consumers agreed on 10 good-quality brands of bread versus only three poor-quality brands; eight good-quality salad dressing brands versus only one poor-quality brand, and nine good versus one poor-quality brand of cleaning products," Consumer Network notes.

Among the 28 product categories in the survey, four—automobiles, frozen food, cookies and paper products—"triggered multiple poor-quality brand citations."

But even in those few categories "where several brands were associated with poor quality, twice as many consumers named good-quality products. And most consumers in most categories did not make a brand-quality association at all," the Consumer Network report says.

"Thus," it continues, "the study finds that few if any brands have successfully communicated to consumers that quality is what they are all about."

Other findings included:

- Many consumers have begun to feel they can't afford not to buy quality.
- Many national brands are already delivering enough quality to satisfy consumers and to talk about.
- Quality is losing its luxury meaning and coming to mean simply "good stuff with real value."
- There is substantial room for improvement in the quality of branded products in some categories, such as canned food, soups, restaurants, appliances, paper goods, automobiles.
- Nevertheless, management plans more quality upgrades than consumers are willing to pay for in other categories.
- Consumers say they believe advertising doesn't tell them very much about the actual quality of the product and what it contains, while management doesn't blame advertising methods or messages for any perceived brand-quality shortfall.
- The definition of quality food has changed to refer to healthful and natural ingredients.
- Dramatic marketing opportunities have been created for good-quality brands in almost all of the 28 categories covered by the study.

The food-related categories in the study were canned, deli/lunchmeat, ice cream, restaurants, breads, cheese, frozen food, juices/drinks, salad dressing, cake mixes, cookies, hot dogs, catsup/condiments and soups.

The other categories were large appliances, haircare products, paper products, skincare, automobiles, cleaning, laundry, plastic/foil, toothcare, small appliances, cosmetics, pantyhose, shaving and toys/games.#

Magazines look forward to strong '84

By STUART J. ELLIOTT

SOUTHAMPTON, BERMUDA—Clearly the members of the Magazine Publishers Assn. and American Society of Magazine Editors were in a far better mood at this year's American Magazine Conference than last year's.

Michael Levy, president of Mediatex Communications and publisher of Texas Monthly, pointed out "the difference in the tone and spirit of the place.

"In October, 1982, everybody knew '83 would be a tough year, a rebuilding year. In October, 1983, everybody realizes '84 is going to be a lot of fun."

But will it? Many magazines continue to be plagued with problems in circulation and/or advertising. Of the five titles carrying the most ad pages through the first three quarters—Business Week, TV Guide, The New Yorker, People, Forbes—only the latter sold more pages than it did last year.

This has been the year of the largest new-magazine failure in history: TV-Cable Week, which one top Time Inc. executive termed "a flaming disaster." And three other magazines have since joined it in going under: Spring, Movies and Technology Illustrated, the latter just last week.

For all these negatives, the mood of the record 660 attendees was still upbeat, exuding what S.H. Price, exec vp-publisher, Newsweek, called "a feeling of confidence that wasn't here last time."

When George Green, president of The New Yorker Magazine Inc., gave his speech as outgoing chairman of MPA, he flatly stated: "The business of magazine publishing is prospering as never before."

The industry powers here agreed. "I feel better than I've felt in at least two years," said Jack D. Rehm, president of Meredith Corp.'s publishing group, who succeeded Mr. Green as MPA chairman.

"Business generally is bouncing back strongly," he continued. "The industry has fared considerably better than [it appeared] six months ago. Momentum has been building throughout the year; '83 will wind up in fine fashion, and I see a very strong '84."

It's "hard to say anything other than it's

Consumers rate advertising high

By NANCY MILLMAN

The image of advertising in the eyes of consumers is more favorable than it is believed to be in the minds of advertising industry leaders, according to an exclusive ADVERTISING AGE poll.

Over-all quality of advertising, creativity and accuracy all scored high with consumers interviewed for a recent study. The study showed that a majority of consumers enjoy the advertising they are exposed to and think that advertising is an important part of the American way of life. A majority of consumers also said they would like their children to work in the advertising business.

The front on which advertising showed a poor image was general honesty and trustworthiness.

Interestingly, newspapers, one of the oldest media, are the most relied upon source of advertising for information about products.

Consumers rely on advertising significantly more for their day-

FTC tells Congress ad deception plans

By RICHARD L. GORDON

WASHINGTON—Advertisers get a map of the Federal Trade Commission's new approach to policing deceptive advertising in a letter the commission has prepared for Congress.

It's the first report ever by FTC to define "deception" and put down on paper what the commission believes it must show before questioning a particular ad.

Three years ago, a similar commission report clarified for the first time FTC's criteria for identifying "unfair" advertising practices. Congress has since grafted key parts of that report onto pending FTC legislation to permanently restrict FTC use of fairness as a basis for prosecutions.

After intense debate within FTC (AA, Oct. 17), the report on deception was adopted 3 to 2 when lame duck commissioner David Clanton, on his final day in office, sided with the commission's conservative bloc, chairman James Miller and commissioner George Douglas.

The report incorporates as official FTC policy chairman Miller's view that deceptive claims are those that might mislead a "reasonable" consumer and cause consumer "injury."

Both points are key elements in a definition of "deception" that the FTC chief has urged Congress to enact into law to place limits on the commission's

NBC criticizes Senate panel action on FCC rules

NEW YORK—NBC issued a statement saying it is disappointed at the "precipitous action" taken by the Senate appropriations committee, which voted for a six-month moratorium on any Federal Communications Commission action on the financial interest and syndication rules (see story, Page 97). NBC said the committee acted "without hearing testimony on the merits and disregarded the recommendations of the federal agencies and departments which have called for changes in the financial interest rule." ABC and CBS had no immediate comment.

First victims fall in net tv season

By JAMES P. FORKAN

New York—A real-life drama, "The Axman Cometh," was enacted last week behind the network tv scenes.

ABC's "9 to 5" and "It's Not Easy" have the dubious honor of being the first victims of the fall '83 season, although ABC officially is saying only that the two sitcoms will be "on hiatus" after Oct. 27.

CBS, meanwhile, hopes to cut its Saturday 8 p.m.-to-9 p.m. losses by dropping "Cutter to Houston," effective Dec. 17. There's no replacement yet, but CBS sources indicated that some specials would run through year's end—and perhaps earlier as well, in the sweeps.

Despite the shortage of so-called "typical" rating weeks in the 4-week-old season, those programing decisions—and others in the offing—were hardly surprising, given the rock-bottom A.C. Nielsen Co. numbers.

Two of the new season's three full weeks of official battle were described by most sources as "atypical," given October baseball. One night of Week 4 was disrupted somewhat by a presidential press conference.

Then again, almost none of the weeks ahead will be typical, what with the November sweeps stunting about to begin, followed by the preemptions for Christmas specials.

Although ABC revamped "9 to 5," few of last season's fans gave it another look in its new Thursday slot. After three weeks, the comedy averaged a mere 19 share,

Mr. Cecil, sources report, will be promoted out of the day-to-day sales management operation and placed in charge of all tv network pricing policy and practices, as well as the CBS marketing force.

James Joyella, vp-marketing at CBS, now will report to Mr. Cecil, who will receive the new title of vp-marketing and sales planning.

In addition, sources reported that the responsibilities of the daypart sales executives will be expanded, although details of this

GM-Toyota worries Nissan

By RALPH GRAY

Dearborn, Mich.—The General Motors-Toyota small-car joint venture is fine if it doesn't spread beyond the U.S. into world markets, according to Nissan Motor Corp. And despite present problems with the joint venture, it should go through, said Hiro Koseki, vp-marketing for Nissan's U.S. sales arm.

But any expansion of the GM-Toyota deal outside the U.S. "might be very serious, not only for Nissan but others," Mr. Koseki said at a news conference for Nissan's 1984 model line.

Currently Toyota and the Federal Trade Commission, which must okay the joint venture, are dickering over the FTC's demand for sensitive price-cost data. Mr. Koseki predicted an eventual compromise, if only because Toyota has no other U.S. options.

A joint venture would be considerably cheaper for Toyota than building a U.S. plant by itself, as Nissan has done in Tennessee for small trucks. "Toyota are stingy merchants," he commented.

For instance, Toyota delayed the expensive tooling up of bigger engines in Japan, and so it can't match the new V-6 engine Nissan is installing in its 1984 300ZX sports coupe. But General Motors has plenty of V6s and that's the sort of thing that troubles Nissan, Mr. Koseki said.

So do GM's plans to import 300,000 Suzuki and Isuzu subcompacts to fill a product vacuum at the low end of the line.

"If import constraints continue in any form, we'd be opposed to any increase going to new entries in the marketplace," said C.P. (Chuck) King, senior vp-sales. "That's an interesting situation—increasing your availabilities by limiting the availabilities of the competition. In a strong market, that's not quite cricket. We don't necessarily agree that what's good for General Motors is good for us."

Not that Nissan is exactly an underdog. It finished the 1983 model year behind Toyota in sales but with a record 526,097 cars and trucks sold.

The gains came from a high carryover inventory. Toyota's import quotas allow it to import more vehicles

Jeno's sets pizza-value ad drive

By JANET NEIMAN

Jeno's Inc. is turning away from price promotion, promising $10 million in advertising for its frozen pizza and pizza rolls in an attempt to reestablish in the consumer's mind the value of frozen pizza.

The move by the Casselberry, Fla.-based company apparently signals the end of the price wars that have characterized frozen pizza sales for the past couple of years.

Rising frozen-pizza prices can be expected for Jeno's and other branded marketers, who have or are expected to become more aggressive advertisers in order to halt the inroads made by store-delivered private label and pizzeria pizza.

Jeno's new drive will be handled by Grey Advertising, New York, recently appointed to the Jeno's account, formerly at JFP & Associates, a Jeno's Inc. sister company. Grey will handle all Jeno's brands, including frozen entrees, along with the company's Mr. P.'s pizza label.

Another Jeno's sister company, Northland Foods, has assigned its Colombo's pizza to Grey (from JFP) as well, but its Chef Saluto

Two key ad executives exit Pepsi

Two executives—both holding the title of ad manager—are joining the parade of Pepsi-Cola USA marketing/advertising people who have left the company since the departure of former president John Sculley earlier this year.

Both Grant Castle and Peter Foulds are joining ad agencies—Mr. Castle to TBWA Advertising and Mr. Foulds to SSC&B—in as-yet undisclosed posts.

Mr. Foulds was responsible for Diet Pepsi and Mountain Dew advertising; Mr. Castle handled Pepsi

Goodyear reviews agency lineup, may add shop

AKRON—Goodyear may juggle assignments of its four agencies and may add another. The company is "seriously reviewing the future" with its agencies, said John Kelley, vp-advertising. Goodyear has talked to SSC&B, not now on its roster. Current agencies on the $50 million account: J. Walter Thompson USA (corporate), Campbell-Ewald (performance and other tires), N W Ayer (general products) and Wyse Advertising (retail). Mr. Kelley doesn't expect the review to be completed before he retires Nov. 11. He will be succeeded by George Lenox, now director of advertising. Goodyear shuffled some assignments after a similar review two years ago.

NBC criticizes Senate panel action on FCC rules

NEW YORK—NBC issued a statement saying it is disappointed at the "precipitous action" taken by the Senate appropriations committee, which voted for a six-month moratorium on any Federal Communications Commission action on the financial interest and syndication rules (see story, Page 97). NBC said the committee acted "without hearing testimony on the merits and disregarded the recommendations of the federal agencies and departments which have called for changes in the financial interest rule." ABC and CBS had no immediate comment.

to-day purchases than they do for major purchases. And in-store advertising comes in second to newspaper advertising both for day-to-day and major purchases, respondents said, with tv advertising coming in third.

The advertising-image tracking study was prepared for Ad Age by Selection Research Inc. (SRI), Lincoln, Neb. A stratified random sample of 1,250 respondents, representing a national sample of the continental U.S., was interviewed for this study in August.

The high scores in the above-mentioned areas, as well as in the rating of advertising as "a highly professional business or occupation," appear to be contrary to the belief on the part of the advertising industry—including the American Assn. of Advertising Agencies—that the business is held in low esteem by U.S. citizens.

The Assn. of National Advertisers also has pledged to fight the negative image of advertising and to work with the Four A's in doing so (AA, Oct. 10).

The Four A's has made improving the image of advertising a top priority for this year.

John Bowen, chairman of Benton & Bowles, New York, and immediate past president of the organization, stressed this message in his valedictory address at the group's annual convention last May (AA, May 23).

Rating ads by media

When making day-to-day purchases, do you rely a great deal, some or very little on information provided by advertising in the following media.

Media	Responses*
Newspapers	66%
In-store	58%
Tv	55%
Magazines	53%
Yellow Pages	51%
Radio	42%
Direct mail	33%

*Per cent of responses indicating "a great deal" or "some."

A committee has been formed under the chairmanship of John O'Toole, chairman of Foote, Cone & Belding, to work intensively on this project.

The Ad Age/SRI study asked a series of questions of its respondents, who were called a minimum of three times to ensure a high completion rate and a low nonresponse bias:

Quality of advertising

Respondents were asked to rate the over-all quality of the advertising they read, see or hear. A total of 88% of all consumers interviewed felt advertising was excellent, good or fair, while only 9% said it was poor. Those consumers in the $40,000-and-up income group rated advertising quality lower than do the other groups. Significantly more respondents in this group rated it as poor.

Advertising quality scores highest over-all with the $20,000-to-$39,000 income group.

A member of the Four A's committee, Burt Manning, chairman-chief executive officer, J. Walter Thompson USA, said he found the consumers' answers to this question "overly generous."

He said, "If we apply our best standards to all advertising, we can't say this high a percentage is good." He said the response may reflect consumers' feelings that "advertising does fulfill a function that people want filled."

Creativity

Respondents were asked to compare creativity in advertising currently appearing to advertising of a year ago. A total of 48% found advertising to be much better or better, while 41% judged the creativity level to be the same.

Only 5% said advertising creativity was worse, and 2% said it was much worse. Creativity scored highest with the $20,000-to-$39,999 income group.

The positive responses to this question decreased as the age of the respondents increased. For example, 59% of the 18-to-24 year olds said advertising creativity was better or much better now than it was a year ago; 46% of the 45-to-54 year olds said it had improved, and 31% of those 65 years old and older saw improvement.

Although Mr. Manning says he feels the concept of "creativity" may be difficult for consumers to evaluate, he said their responses reflect a perception that ads are more "original" and are delivering "more of what they want."

Honesty

The consumers were asked to compare the degree of perceived honesty in advertising today with that of a year ago. A total of 26% said advertising was much better or better in terms of honesty, while 56% judged it to be about the same. A total of 13% judged it to be worse or much worse.

Of those who rate advertising as less honest now, a higher percentage are male than female. In addition, 54% of those who rate advertising as worse now than a year ago in terms of honesty, and 72% of those who rate it as much worse, have incomes of $20,000 or more.

Though the degree of honesty in advertising compares favorably with that of last year, people tend to believe that advertising is not, in general, trustworthy.

Respondents also were asked, "Do you agree or disagree with the following: 'Advertising is generally honest and trustworthy.'" Only 4% strongly agreed, while 45% agreed; 30% disagreed, and 14% strongly disagreed.

There was a lack of correlation, however, when consumers were asked about accuracy in advertising. A total of 78% said advertising is accurate, while 18% found it misleading.

One explanation for this discrepancy, according to the research company, is that while the over-all perception of honesty is poor, people believe they are selective in their personal use of advertising information. In general, as income goes up, evaluation of honesty goes down.

Providing information

Respondents were asked to compare current advertising with that of a year ago regarding its providing of information they need.

A total of 28% rated it much better or better; 57% said it was about the same; 6% said it was worse, and 1% said it was much worse.

Media

When making day-to-day purchases, respondents were asked, "Do you rely a great deal, some or very little on information provided by advertising in the following media: Tv, radio, magazines, newspapers, yellow pages, direct mail and in-store materials.

Newspapers scored the highest. A total of 66% of respondents said they relied a great deal or some on newspapers; 58% rely on in-store materials; 55% on tv; 53% on magazines; 51% on Yellow Pages; 42% on radio, and 33% on direct mail.

Broken down by income level, people with over $40,000 in yearly income are using newspapers, Yellow Pages and in-store advertising for product information on day-to-day purchases. Newspapers also rank very high with the $20,000-and-up income group.

The same question was asked in reference to making major purchases, and the results show a lower degree of reliance on advertising over-all. Newspapers still scored the highest, with 52% of respondents saying they relied on newspaper ads a great deal or some; in-store advertising was relied on by 50%; tv by 46%; magazines, 45%; Yellow Pages, 34%; radio, 31%, and direct mail, 28%.

A surprising 53% of respondents said they would like their children to be employed in the advertising business. A total of 93% of respondents agreed or strongly agreed that advertising is an important part of the American economy and the American way of life, and 90% agreed or strongly agreed that advertising is a highly professional business or occupation.

In addition, 59% said they enjoy the advertising they read, see and hear and generally feel good about it, while 32% disagreed or strongly disagreed with that statement.

Industry studies repeatedly show the image of advertising very close to the bottom of the ladder in comparison with other professions. A study presented at a recent industry conference shows advertising professionals next to last—just above used car salesmen.

JWT's Mr. Manning said the high percentage of respondents to the AA/SRI survey that would like to see their children enter advertising probably is due to the kind of response he does get from others—that advertising is exciting, glamorous, fun and financially lucrative.

According to FCB's Mr. O'Toole, the new Four A's committee has thus far identified three areas to investigate:

- A negative attitude toward advertising resulting from indirect experience, such as plays, movies and books. The committee will, after study of this matter, propose actions the Four A's might take to balance this input.
- The advertising messages themselves. The committee is looking for quantitative research that will substantiate what kinds of advertisements contribute most to a negative attitude, and if those ads are—as many top industry executives believe—less effective in the marketplace.
- The nature of tv clutter. The group will investigate if the frequency of interruption of programing and the type of interruption contribute to a negative attitude toward advertising.#

Ogilvy sticks to his guns on celebrities

'Appalled' by commercials he sees in U.S.

By FRED DANZIG

New York—Back in town to "yak a bit" as he furthered the cause of selling his latest book, David Ogilvy busied himself here recently with tv appearances on ABC's "Good Morning America," radio shows and a seminar.

At the Museum of Broadcasting seminar, the distinguished adman, author of "Ogilvy on Advertising" and creative leader of Ogilvy & Mather, made the following points:

- "Celebrity commercials" score above average in recall and below average in selling "and still they're being used."

He doesn't consider his agency's use of actor John Houseman for the Smith Barney investment house campaign a case of celebrity advertising, since Mr. Houseman "was not a celebrity before we put him on the air." Mr. Ogilvy added, "Now Mr. Houseman is working for others. I wish to God my partners had gotten him to sign an exclusive contract."

- He has reservations about the use of the client in ads, such as Chrysler Corp.'s Lee Iacocca appearing in its tv commercials. "If you get your client to do commercials and he does the lines badly, you can't tell him to get the hell out. If he does them well, he'll go on to become a celebrity. He'll be recognized in public, bothered for his autograph. This creates problems. He also has to deal with the possibility of being kidnaped; he'll need protection. I wouldn't do it to a client."
- Mr. Ogilvy is interested in what works and what doesn't work and has no desire to discover why something works or fails. To discover the why, he said, requires too much time and "you get right back to the same conclusion anyhow."
- He is "absolutely appalled" by the tv commercials he has seen during his stays in hotel rooms around the country. Each commercial is "more vulgar and asinine than the other. It's an endless succession of crummy, cruddy commercials made by local people who don't know what they're doing. It reflects a country where the culture has gotten completely out of control."
- Recall is not that important. He said that one of his associates once told him, "I can get recall by showing a gorilla in a jockstrap."

As for research that shows what tends to work in advertising, Mr. Ogilvy said approvingly, "Even a blind pig can find truffles, but it pays to know that they grow under oak trees."

- "The selling power of the commercial," he said with a twinkle, "is in inverse proportion to its cost." This came after he observed that tv commercial costs have become a "scandal" and have gotten "completely out of hand."
- American advertising used to be years ahead of European advertising, but that is no longer true. "Absolutely the most agreeable commercials today are coming out of England." He later added to his list of "best" some "brilliant" work he had seen from Bangkok.

DAVID OGILVY

- Someone once told him, "You can do anything in television. The only limit is your imagination." Mr. Ogilvy said his response was, "Oh, how wonderful. I went home, said I can do anything. And couldn't think of anything."
- Direct response—"selling off the page or off the tv commercial"—is created by "the only people who really know what the results are. The rest of us are guessing." He said Al Eicoff, chairman of A. Eicoff & Co., Chicago, a division of O&M, told him, "You can't sell anything under two minutes. That's what's needed for the complete sales pitch."

Yet, Mr. Ogilvy noted, when shown in prime time, nothing happens with these two-minute commercials. "But put them on late at night and the orders come in."

- Naming competing brands? Comparative advertising? "It's a damn fool thing to do." He said viewers too often think it's a commercial for your competitor.
- "If you're selling a fire extinguisher, open the commercial with a fire. Open with the most dramatic scene. If you save it for the end, the consumer will have gone to the bathroom by that time."
- "Don't show visual banalities." Show the product in use whenever you can.
- Asked about cable tv, Mr. Ogilvy repeated an opinion he first gave several years ago: "I'm too old to learn about cable." And he added, "Screw it."#

Western ways take back seat to tradition

Sex roles clearly distinguished—and most want to keep it that way

By Hilary McLaine

For more than half of all Japanese families, life begins each morning with a Western phenomenon: A tv soap opera.

But to conclude from this that fundamental changes have occured in Japanese habit and attitude may be a mistake. Japan, after all, is a land of paradox, and appearances are often deceptive.

Take the myth of the working wife. Pundits have concluded from statistics showing that 45% of married women have a job of some kind, that a major shift in women's status and role within society has begun. But in a typical Japanese marriage—far more than in its U.S. or U.K. counterpart—the partners still have clearly distinguished roles, which rarely, if ever, overlap.

"My wife says she wants to get a job when our son is old enough to go to school," says Yukio Yoshika, 30, a local government employe. "But women working is just a means of killing time; her job is to look after the family and our home."

While his wife, Masako, 27, smiles patiently, she too is convinced that the traditions governing the wife's role have changed very little.

This is one of many examples in which there is no copying of Western models, but rather a proud retention of things Japanese.

George Fields, chairman of ASI Market Research Japan, agrees: "The wife gets the pay envelope and takes the running of the family very seriously. I see no evidence of this changing; it's too ingrained in the culture."

Mrs. Yoshika rises at 6:00 a.m. to prepare the traditional Japanese breakfast of rice, miso soup (made with fermented bean paste), nori (seaweed) and green tea. Her home is a four room kitchen-and-bathroom apartment in the Tokyo suburb of Miyahara.

Yukio Yoshika relaxes with wife Masako and son Shohei in their living-dining room, which doubles as a bedroom.

Half of the living room is furnished in traditional Japanese style with tatami mats on the floor and a low dining table. These are pushed to one side at night and the futons or mattresses are laid down for the couple to sleep. Shohei, their son, has his own room, next to the kitchen, and Yukio has a small study for working in the evenings.

The other half of the living room is Western style, with a sofa, coffee table and tv. "We want some more furniture but we must wait until my husband gets his bonus in December," Masako says. Japanese employes receive two bonuses per year and companies gear all credit payments to this pattern.

The apartment which the couple are buying with a $70 monthly mortgage payment (from his monthly salary of $910) is on a danchi, or estate, many of which are government owned. Many Japanese companies provide housing for their employes and offer around 3% interest on home loans. "That's one of the reasons foreign companies here find it difficult to get good staff, they can't compete with such benefits," explains Mr. Fields.

Although the Yoshika's home is bigger than average, Masako, like most Japanese women, spends less time in it than her Western counterpart. There is less to clean and although laundry is generally a daily chore (because there is nowhere to store dirty clothes) shopping for food is an important part of the daily routine.

The two famous characteristics of Japanese cuisine—freshness and presentation—provide the key to much of the housewife's daily duties. Even working wives will shop daily in their lunch-hour or after work and take all the time they need.

Once the fresh food is chosen—Masako's husband loves sashimi (raw fish)—the actual preparation is quick, so time spent in the kitchen cooking is also less than in the West. "The Japanese housewife may have a toaster oven but it's only used for heating frozen food or late night snacks. Western food seldom finds its way on to the dinner table at night," says Mr. Fields, adding that "the bulk of frozen food sold here—pizzas or hamburgers—is cooked the same day."

Masako spends $230 per month on food to provide her family with a diet of traditional Japanese fare. In her regular shopping basket will be miso, tofu (bean curd), fish, vegetables, rice, soft drinks and tea. "We sometimes buy hamburgers or spaghetti. I don't really notice if products are Western or not, I'm more concerned with good value," she says.

This attitude toward the marketing of Western products indicates a significant shift of emphasis in the post-war years.

"The Japanese now feel they themselves can set standards. It's totally irrelevant if a product is a brand leader in the U.S. Consumers are only concerned that the product is to their taste," says Mr. Fields.

Foreign marketers in Japan, especially in food retailing, must fight very hard for acceptance, not only with the housewife but with Japan's very complex distribution and trading networks. One U.S. manufacturing representative says, "It's doubly hard because even products that are only conceptually Western are seen as expensive."

The housewife's lunch is universally something quick and simple: sometimes leftovers, sometimes green tea poured over rice with salt and thin slices of salmon and occasionally a prepared snack product. Most housewives "wouldn't dare serve such food to their husbands," says Mr. Fields.

In the evenings, Masako is more fortunate than many wives whose husbands demonstrate company loyalty by participating in after-work activities with their fellow employes. Yukio admits that he used to "drink a lot of sake when he was a bachelor," but he now comes home to see the baby, watch tv for a couple of hours and to study before going to bed around 11:00 p.m.

The Shibuya family lives in a much smaller government-owned apartment in the center of Tokyo. "The tv is never off," says Mrs. Shibuya, who works for an insurance company to supplement her husband's income from his own small export company.

Also living with them is their daughter Noriko, 17, and Mr. Shibuya's mother. All have different tv program preferences and fight for baseball, drama, rock music and old samurai tales on the eight Tokyo stations. Noriko buys magazines or listens to the radio, but tv is the only real family entertainment.

It is irrelevant if a product is a brand leader in the U.S. Consumers are only concerned that the product is to their taste.

"We don't have much chance to go out to dinner or anything like that," says Mrs. Shibuya. "Sundays we go out sometimes, but entertaining and visiting isn't the Japanese way."

Mr. Fields believes the Japanese housewife "uses tv like a radio. I think that's why there is so much music in commercials. Even when she's away from the set in the kitchen, she can hear the jingles as reminders. Radio is really for young people's music."

Kazuko Hioka, 24, is a sales promotion assistant at Ricoh, the copier and office equipment marketer.

Since graduating from college nearly two years ago, Kazuko has been living in the company's dormitory in Yokohama rather than face a four-hour commute from her family home. But recently she decided to move back home to "have my hi-fi and more privacy," she says.

In fact, most young people in Japan live at home until they get married. As a result, they have more money to spend on consumer goods.

Kazuko and her boyfriend both work for the same company and are planning and saving to get married. She notes that working together "is very typical in Japan; we both work long hours and there's no chance to meet people outside the office."

Japanese weddings are occasions to display the full pomp and ceremony of Japanese tradition—at an average cost of $25,000.

While many Japanese companies require their new female employes to sign a document pledging that they will resign when they get married, Ricoh has no such stipulation.

Miss Hioka spends her free evenings meeting with her girl friends from school in coffee bars or restaurants in Tokyo. "At the weekend I'll go to the movies with my boyfriend and I just love Tokyo Disneyland," she says.

But if she follows the pattern of the Yoshikas, those cinema visits will be curtailed to two or three times a year as family and housing priorities take precedence.

However, there is a new trend emerging which will give Miss Hioka more opportunities to socialize than the housewives of her mother's generation. Mr. Fields explains: "The post-war population bulge is now in its mid-thirties, with maybe one or two children. It is significant that when using national average statistics, the expenditures on family restaurant meals have grown from $350 per year in 1976 to $500 in 1981." He links this with the relatively recent government edict of closing offices on Saturdays: "So like it or not, the husband is home more on weekends."

Sumitaka Kita is president of K&E Advertising, an agency he set up 20 years ago with his wife Mariko. The continuing success of the agency for clients like NEC, Nikon, and Pioneer keeps Mr. Kita's entertainment schedule very full, in addition to which he travels overseas from three to four months every year.

Their home in the affluent coastal town of Zushi, just beyond Kamakura and one and a half hours from Tokyo, was designed by Mr. Kita and is decorated with rare treasures from all over the world. "My husband was brought up by the sea and he always wanted to live near it, but he's never here to enjoy it," says his wife.

Mrs. Kita is never involved in her husband's business entertaining but spends a lot of time shopping locally for the family meals. The Kitas have two sons, Tetsuzo, 20, and Syozo, 19, and a daughter Asoko, 16.

"I never buy Western prepared food," says Mrs. Kita. "The kids just don't think it tastes good. They consider it my responsibility to prepare and serve good fresh food, and I also think that that is my duty to them," she says.

For Mr. Kita, like many successful Japanese businessmen, the golf course is becoming increasingly important. But with a day of golf costing up to $160 at a top flight course, it is a privilege only for a few.

Mr. Kita, 50, has worked hard to establish the elegant international lifestyle he and his family enjoy. He lives by his creed: "The flourishing of the individual."

But for Japan, Mr. Kita believes, it will be a gradual process. "As Japanese people have more time for themselves they will become more individualistic."

But there are generally more pressures to reinforce the status quo in Japan than to change it. Economic success has brought a renewal of confidence in the Japanese way of doing things, and many Japanese would cite the preservation of tradition as the key reason for that success.

Mrs. Shibuya and daughter Noriko admit their tv is never off and are often in their small apartment, since "entertaining and visiting isn't the Japanese way."

When 24-year-old Kazuko Hioka marries, her leisure will be curtailed, as family and house assume priority.

Wendy's in magazines for potato introduction

By SCOTT HUME

Wendy's International's introduction next month of "Hot Stuffed" baked potatoes to all 2,500 of its domestic restaurants is the fast-food industry's latest and strongest acknowledgment that it serves a customer base whose tastes and demands in food are changing.

It also signals the No. 3 hamburger chain's renewed determination to grow by expanding the fast-food market as well as through stealing share from the growing list of competitors.

With increased advertising funds and confidence that the stuffed baked potatoes match those changing consumer tastes, Dublin, O.-based Wendy's has committed $10 million in support of next month's rollout.

Coupled with a $10 million in-store equipment investment, it will be Wendy's costliest new-product introduction.

"There's no question the demand for lighter, lower-calorie foods is for real and accelerating," said senior vp-marketing William Welter. "There's also no question fast-food has to respond to it."

Wendy's franchisees in September increased from 1% to 1.5% of sales their contribution to the national advertising program, which will give Wendy's a stronger presence than its $75 million national and local budget allows.

It won't match McDonald's Corp., whose franchisees recently upped their contribution to its already huge national fund to 2% (AA, Sept. 26). But it could help Wendy's achieve its goal of increasing average per-store sales from the current $750,000 to $1 million by 1986.

The baked potatoes, which have been tested for several months in 300 stores around the country, are available plain for $1.29 or with one of five toppings (cheese, broccoli and cheese, bacon and cheese, chili and cheese or sour cream and chives) priced at $1.69 or $1.89.

The product-introduction campaign, created by national agency Dancer Fitzgerald Sample, New York, begins the week of Nov. 7.

Commercials (split between network and spot buys) combine food closeups against a neon-lit black background with jazzy, saxophone-dominated music.

At the end of one of two spots a woman breathes fire beneath the "Hot Stuffed" logo.

Mr. Welter admits the look and feel of the introductory campaign are a far cry from the pigtailed "Wendy" character in the chain's signage.

But the aim is to grab as much attention as possible as well as convey the message that Wendy's is keeping up with food trends.

Wendy's traditionally (and purposely) has appealed to an adult market, but the baked potatoes especially are targeted to adult women, who never have been very heavy users of fast-food.

In line with that, Wendy's is backing the "Hot Stuffed" rollout with its first use of print advertising. Half-page spreads will appear in Better Homes & Gardens, Good Housekeeping, Ladies' Home Journal, Newsweek and People. Spot radio also will be used.

The "Hot Stuffed" spots will be Wendy's fifth distinct set of tv spots to air this year, but Mr. Welter dismissed comparisons with rival McDonald's, whose critics charge that its continually changing advertising messages have muddied the fast-food leader's image for consumers (AA, Oct. 3).

The new spots represent a new product introduction within the "You want something better. . .You're Wendy's kind of people" umbrella rather than a truly new campaign, he said.

The baked potato campaign is planned for a six-week run. What will follow it still is being decided, although Mr. Welter did say that a new set of humorous tv commercials produced by Chicago director Joe Sedelmaier has been completed.

Like those spots that aired this summer and fall (AA, May 23, et seq.), they will focus on specific operational differences between Wendy's and "some other hamburger chains."

Also planned is a revamping of the chain's Kids Meal. This will include upgrading the appearance of the packaging and enhancing the toy premiums from tie-ins with such children's tv programs as NBC's "Alvin & the Chipmunks."

Mr. Welter would not rule out the possibility of Wendy's eventually advertising on Saturday mornings.

"We're looking for ways to better accommodate families with children, but we're not going to go to tile on the floor, bolted-down seating or McDonald's Playlands," he said. "We're committed to an adult atmosphere and orientation, but we want to make children happy and allow the adults to enjoy their meal."

That meal could include additional new products in the near future.

As the baked potato meets the challenge from such new healthy-foods chains such as D'Lites (AA, Aug. 22), Wendy's also is looking at additions to its basic hamburger line in recognition of the threat posed by the so-called "upscale hamburger" restaurants (AA, Oct. 17).

In test now are a series of "gourmet hamburgers": Quarter-pound patties with bleu cheese, guacamole, grilled onion and swiss cheese or mushrooms and Monterey Jack cheese toppings. A variety of dessert items also are being tested.

With breakfast and dinner menus also in some stores, Wendy's is on the verge of making the remaining significant breakthrough for fast-food—offering three distinct menus geared to each of the meal periods.

"The baked potato is just the beginning," Mr. Welter said. "Now that we have ovens in the units, it opens up enormous possibilities."#

AHP presents a new face

cause of its dependable and generous payout, analysts say.

Many analysts at the meeting last week said they believe the company supported its optimism of attaining a 15% annual growth rate, while some have taken a "wait-and-see" stance.

One analyst pointed out that two years ago, drugs contributed 39% to sales and 55% to income, while those figures now are up to 48% for sales and 62% for operating income. He expects those numbers to rise in the next two years.

AHP management told analysts it was prepared to sell the Ekco and Prestige product lines of housewares, pots and pans to the right buyer—businesses that totaled almost $500 million in sales in 1982.

Although executives said those were the only businesses for sale, analysts speculated that American Home Foods might be next on the selling block because of the low margins in the food category.

With the money the company will generate from divestitures and operations, it will be able to acquire businesses that fit under the healthcare umbrella as well as maintain its generous payout, a policy that analysts believe is inviolable.

Meanwhile, the company is planning defensive moves to protect the growth of one of its major brands, Inderal, when the brand's patent expires next year.

Inderal, which is both the leading heart drug and second-most prescribed drug in the U.S., contributed $304 million to total sales of $4.6 billion in 1982 and is expected to contribute $350 million this year.

Judson St. John, president, Ayerst Laboratories, the subsidiary that markets the drug, told how the company expects to maintain sales growth.

He said AHP is hoping to be able to advertise the prescription drug directly to the consumer if the Food & Drug Administration gives its blessing.

- The company already has given the tablets a new unusual hexagonal shape embossed with a large I, and has received FDA approval for new indications for the drug.

Inderal now is competing in a $500 million market in the U.S., but if the company receives approval for recommending that the drug be used for anxiety as well, that market potential would double.

Management also continued to express optimism that the FDA soon would approve the over-the-counter marketing of ibuprofen (AA, July 25), a category AHP is prepared to enter with a brand called Advil.

Executives indicated that AHP would continue to support new otc products heavily with advertising.

Stanley F. Barshay, president of Whitehall Laboratories, said the division will spend $135 million in advertising this year in the U.S.

Executives said Advil, if approved, and Whitehall's entry in the skin treatment category with Youth Garde would increase the division's ad budget.

The consumer division also has begun a physician sampling program for its otc brands to gain more support from the medical community. Samples and promotional materials have been developed.

New nonprescription products introduced recently include Riopan antacid tablets and a new enteric-coated APF (Arthritis Pain Formula) analgesic.

Mr. Barshay said Whitehall competes in 18 major categories and leads the market in many.

Among them, he said Primatene holds 83% of the bronchial asthma market and Preparation H, 60% of the hemorrhoidal preparation market.#

Behind a national campaign for its Taco Light, PepsiCo's Taco Bell chain set the pace among the top 15 restaurant chains with an 89% increase in first-half tv ad spending. Note that even with the "Battle of the Burgers" raging, Burger King cut back on network spending but nearly doubled its spot tv spending. Jerrico's Long John Silver's cut back 15% from its 1982 level, but has advertised heavily in the second half. Over-all, network buys were 16% above the first half of 1982, while local tv expenditures rose 25%.

Church's seeking new management

By TOM BAYER

DALLAS—Church's Fried Chicken is searching for a new management team to intensify the chain's marketing efforts and help put Church's back on a profitable track.

The sudden shift in gears was precipitated last week when Roger Harvin, Church's chairman-president, elected to take what the company called "early retirement." He had been with Church's since 1968 and had been in the top position since 1975.

Mr. Harvin's retirement came just weeks after the company's board of directors named a committee of outside directors, not including Mr. Harvin, to hire a new chief operating officer and a chief financial officer, two recently vacated positions.

Church's third-quarter earnings were $6.7 million, down 37% from the previous year's third quarter, while revenues for the quarter rose to $112.8 million, up 7.5% from the year earlier.

For the nine months ended Sept. 4, Church's reported net earnings of $25.5 million on revenues of $310 million, compared with the first nine months of 1982 in which earnings were $28.9 million on revenues of $292 million.

The management move also signaled an increase in the possibility that Church's might be taken over by another company, according to Michael Culp, analyst with Prudential-Bache Securities, but he emphasizes that the word was "possibility" rather than "probability."

South Texas rancher J. David Bamberger, a former officer with Church's and its largest single stockholder, stepped into the chairman's position last week, vowing to make the company more aggressive, beef up its $9 million advertising budget and marketing programs and put Church's back on track.

Mr. Bamberger did not detail specific changes.

After flitting from agency to agency in recent years, Church's pledged to get serious about advertising and selected Grey Advertising, Los Angeles, to help it reverse the erosion of Church's customer totals (AA, Jan 17).

Church's, still cautious about its use of advertising, has adopted a theme of "Kick the bucket and come to Church's." The theme is airing in about 25 markets representing less than half of the company's stores.#

Pennwalt readies Corsym

ROCHESTER, N.Y.—Pennwalt's pharmaceutical division is expecting final approval by early December for the second drug containing its patented 12-hour drug delivery system that can be used in liquid formulations.

The brand, Corsym, is a decongestant/antihistamine expected to be on the market in December.

The company said Corsym will be promoted only to healthcare professionals initially. Later, it may be advertised to the consumer but, if so, may carry a different brand name.

Sieber & McIntyre has the assignment.

Last year, Pennwalt received FDA approval for marketing a cough preparation, Delsym, with the 12-hour formula.

Pennwalt also licensed A.H. Robins Co. to use the system, and Robins is selling the product under the name Extend-12 with heavy consumer advertising and promotions.#

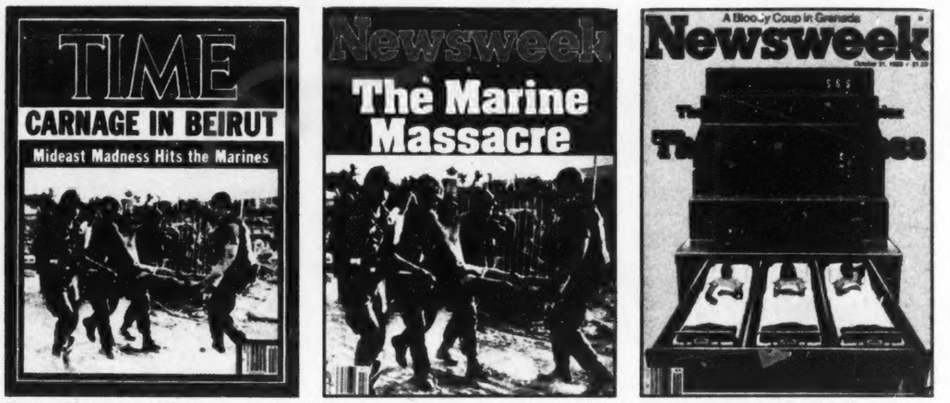
NEWSPAPER



Both Time and Newsweek rushed new cover stories when the Lebanon bombing broke, but about one-third of Newsweek's readers received the old cover story on medical costs.

News media put to test

New York—The nation's two military crises last week—the slaughter of U.S. Marines in Lebanon and the invasion of Grenada by U.S. forces—provided something of a litmus test for the country's top news organizations.

Time and Newsweek ripped up issues already put to bed for that week, rushing in the early hours of Sunday morning to put together cover stories on the Lebanon killings.

The various networks struggled with incomplete and conflicting reports as first word of the disaster filtered back to the country; CBS was the first news organization to air information about the Lebanon crisis, and the other two major networks competed throughout the morning of Oct. 23 to give viewers the latest information.

Satellite News Channel devoted its Sunday coverage to the Mideast incident, delivering what staffers at the all-news channel said was probably its best performance in its one-year existence. Ironically, that came just days before SNC was set to fold.

Chevy boosts ads to women

By RALPH GRAY

Warren, Mich.—Chevrolet will step up advertising to the women's market with a 15% heavier buy in women's magazines.

"Our advertising is getting more focused and it will continue to get more focused. Women will play greater and greater roles in purchasing vehicles, and it will require us to do some different things at Chevrolet," said Stephen D. McAvoy, manager-passenger car advertising.

"We need to address our message to the working woman as well as the influential housewife," he said. Chevrolet, with some $28 million invested in magazines last year, also is running high-visibility merchandising programs to attract women, said Matthew K. Murphy, national manager-passenger car merchandising.

"Women buy 29% of all cars themselves and are involved in more than half the buying decisions," said Mr. Murphy. "The women's market is catching everyone's attention with 50% of women in the workforce and 80% of households with two wage earners."

There will be more of the kind of ads developed for the S-10 Blazer, Mr. McAvoy said. That one shows scripted letters and a stylish woman with the headline, "The kind of Blazer it is depends upon the kind of woman you are." Campbell-Ewald, Warren, Mich., is the Chevy agency.

For now, ads for such favorite feminine transportation as the Camaro Sports Coupe, Chevette and Cavalier will appeal to both sexes, Mr. McAvoy said. So will some of the heavy sports buys Chevrolet has made, especially the Olympics. "The Olympics really aren't a sports buy but the best prime time buy you can make," he said.

Chevrolet also has the World Championship of Women's Golf, a tie-in with Bonne Bell cosmetics for the Boston 10K women's race, and "wine and cheese" parties at Chicago area dealerships.

There also are tie-ins with Jordache jeans, Kraft Foods and Mademoiselle magazine boutiques in

K-C's Huggies claims grip on 2nd place

By NANCY GIGES

Having just broken its first national advertising for Kleenex Huggies disposable diapers with refastenable tapes, Kimberly-Clark is basking in its claim of surpassing Procter & Gamble's Luvs as the No. 2 brand.

But the company is well aware that it can't rest. Said Richard Bowers, product manager-infant care products, "We're not so naive to think that P&G won't defend its products," but he believes Huggies will continue to grow because of its superior product performance in absorbency and stopping leakage.

Mr. Bowers said he expects Huggies to continue to close the gap in market share between itself, estimated at slightly more than 21%, and P&G's Pampers, at 40%. Luvs has 21%.

"We still have a long way to go [to become No. 1]," he said, but he maintained that is the company's goal.

P&G has been adding refastenable tapes to both Pampers and Luvs in several areas. Luvs with refastenable tapes is sold in about 25% of the country, including the West Coast and Detroit, and Pampers was introduced with refastenable tapes in Georgia, Alabama and South Carolina in August. P&G also has introduced Pampers in those markets in a new larger size, maximum absorbency toddler, for the child weighing between 23 lbs. and 35 lbs.

The tape on the Pampers product, unlike that on Luvs or Huggies, is one piece that can be refitted and refastened any number of times.

The tapes on Luvs and Huggies can be refitted once on each side but refastened any number of times in the same spot. The only mention of the new tapes on the P&G products is on packaging.

Kimberly-Clark has struggled for years to become a significant factor in the now $2.5 billion disposable diaper market. Earlier brands, Kimbies and another sold under the Kleenex name, were dropped once the company saw a winner in Huggies in the late 1970s.

Before Huggies was national, it was running neck and neck with Luvs, but as the company focused its attention on rolling national, the brand fell back somewhat. Now, a year after attaining nationwide distribution, it again is leading the category in brand

Warner, Bell unit in cable test

By CRAIG REISS

New York—Warner Communications and Bell Atlantic are expected to form a co-venture to test an interactive cable information and entertainment service in the Pittsburgh cable franchise of Warner's subsidiary Warner Cable.

Spokesmen for the two principal companies have declined to comment on the reports.

According to knowledgeable sources, however, the plan calls for combining cable wires and telephone lines for the transmission of interactive cable data.

The plan is significant in several ways. First, it will allow Warner to develop an interactive system that will enable viewers to order some programing through their cable converter boxes by using the telephone lines. The change from Warner Cable's Qube interactive system, which transmits data only through the cable wire, will allow Warner to develop the service with considerably less investment in hardware and construction.

The co-venture also signals the first movements by a new American Telephone & Telegraph corporate spin-off following its di-

Adman Ernst fined, gets weekends in jail

By CHRISTY MARSHALL

New York—Starting Dec. 7, John Ernst, who recently resigned as chairman of Advertising to Women, will be spending 26 weekends behind bars.

Within a month, he will be paying the government $20,000, the amount he was fined after pleading guilty in August to charges of tax evasion and conspiracy (AA, Aug. 15).

Aside from using ATW assets to pay for such personal expenses as trips and personal gifts, Mr. Ernst was charged with setting up a system in the agency whereby certain employes who were granted "D" accounts could charge $3,000 to $5,000 worth of personal expenses to the company. Mr. Ernst denies that some accounts were "unlimited."

Mr. Ernst is married to Lois Geraci Ernst, president-creative director of Advertising to Women.

Mr. Ernst stood before U.S. district court Judge Vincent Broderick and delivered a last plea before sentencing. He asked the judge "to take into account the suffering I have gone through, that my family has gone through and the rest of my company has gone through. It has been very painful, very difficult."

He also spoke of "disproportionate vilification by the press in reporting this." He then said, "I have been brought up all my life to request forgiveness. I would ask your forgiveness now."

On the first count of conspiring with others to defraud the government, Judge Broderick set a fine of $10,000 (the maximum) and three years in jail. That sentence was commuted to six months of weekends (Friday nights to Sunday nights), to be followed by probation for the next five years.

On the second count, Mr. Ernst again was fined the full $10,000 and given a three-year sentence to run concurrently with the first three-year term. The judge suspended the sentence, and put Mr. Ernst on five years probation.

As a condition of probation he must "devise and implement a program" to train ex-offenders in the advertising business and help them find jobs. Mr. Ernst was requested to submit the proposal by Nov. 26. Judge Broderick also charged Mr. Ernst to cooperate with the Internal Revenue Service to collect any additional taxes owed.

"This judgment is important not only as far as Mr. Ernst is concerned but for taxpayers in this country generally and, in particular, in the area where Mr. Ernst is professionally involved," the judge said.

Mr. Ernst has been succeeded as ATW chairman by E.W. Kelley, 66, who has held top posts at consumer goods companies such as Fairmont Foods, General

Christmas war for chocolatiers

By GAY JERVEY

Gourmet chocolate marketers next week will throw down their velvet gloves and start fencing in what promises to be the most critical, competitive Christmas season in their highfalutin history.

Until now marketed by word-of-mouth mystique—with a dash or two of elegant advertising, notably from Godiva Chocolatier—the segment is about to enter the world of expanded print and tv advertising.

Gourmet chocolate marketers will spend more than $5 million in advertising this year, with some 70% of that slated for Christmas.

It won't be a price war—all command $18 per pound and up—but rather one involving whose taste and panache consumers crave most.

No one will be watching more closely than Nestle and Hershey Foods, both of whom are eyeing this segment, which is high on calories, profits and, most of all, that elusive element known as insatiable consumer demand.

Nestle is testing a "Nestle Chocolate Collection" Christmas direct mailing. Hershey is making much ado about its Golden Almond bar, which looks and reportedly tastes more avant-garde than the traditional Hershey bar.

As for the real imported thing, Perugina chocolates, an Italian import that until last Christmas did no advertising at all, will step out in a new, decidedly different tv campaign Nov. 7 that could do for chocolates what "Flashdance" did for torn t-shirts.

The 30-second ad—created by Perugina's agency, Cannon Associates, New York—is a montage of high-speed photography backed by a pulsating punk-style music. Candies levitate from boxes, hazelnuts fall into pools of melted chocolate, and a foil wrapper turns into a pair

Anacin up in awareness

By SCOTT HUME

The new advertising approach American Home Products has adopted for its Anacin pain reliever may be the best medicine for its market-share headache.

adWatch

Of a random sample of 1,250 adults surveyed in September, 147—or 11.8%—said advertising for Anacin was the first to come to mind among all advertising for medicine and drugs they had seen, heard or read in the last 30 days.

That was 4.4 percentage points better than Anacin's share of top-of-mind ad awareness the preceding month and the pain reliever's highest share of responses since the inauguration of the adWatch survey in April, 1982.

Earlier this year, American Home Products' Whitehall Laboratories unit dropped actress Patricia Neal as commercial spokeswoman for Anacin and introduced a series of new tv spots for the product (AA, Aug. 8).

In a stark, cinema-verite style, these spots use

Opponents of split 30s fear basic change in tv

By CRAIG REISS

New York—The current split 30s experiment under way at all three tv networks is being viewed by many advertisers as the gestation of a new media Frankenstein monster.

The experiment, as it is termed by all three networks, involves the acceptance of nonintegrated-product commercials. The single 30-second spot is used to advertise two unrelated products from a single advertiser—usually two 15-second spots, but the lengths of the two commercials do not have to be identical.

The experiment has developed into one of advertising's liveliest debates this year. At stake, many say, is the way tv is bought and sold and perhaps the effectiveness of tv as an advertising medium.

Critics say split 30s will create unmanageable commercial clutter on the tv airwaves. This they see as spawning new competition among advertisers for positioning of their advertisements within the commercial pod, or break.

Critics argue it also could lead to the 15-second spot replacing the 30-second commercial as the standard sales unit in network tv. As with the evolution from 60-second to 30-second spots, critics predict that the cost of a 15-second spot a few years from now will be the same as a 30-second commercial today.

The critics also worry that the 15-second standard unit will reduce the range of creative options in tv advertising. Some advertisers say a 15-second spot, in many cases, can accomplish creatively no more than an outdoor board or a print ad with little copy text.

With the price of network tv ad time expected to continue to rise, these advertisers say the growth of split 30s and the inevitable evolution to the 15-second standard will force many advertisers into alternative media.

Proponents of split 30s generally dismiss the arguments against such spots as being nothing more than "reactionary fears" in the face of change. They point to the many benefits and new advertising opportunities

Videogame ads zero in on young males

Computers force marketers to try segmented approach

By BOB MARICH

Low-price home computers have edged videogame marketing out of the mass market into a more segmented niche.

Young males are the focus of marketing efforts for videogames, experiencing their worst year. Tv advertising, a mainstay of the category, is targeted at sports, children's and teen fare.

Although young males always have been the heart of the market, videogame marketers took a broader approach a few years ago. Convincing parents, who didn't understand the then-new videogame, was necessary at the time.

"Our task has changed from a missionary role to one now of differentiating product offerings," said Bill Simmeth, Atari group product manager-game hardware.

Also, the segmented approach is being employed because of retrenchment. Faced by competition from relatively cheap home computers that also offer videogame play, prices were slashed, cutting profit margins.

Nonetheless, unit sales are tailing off domestically (see chart at right). Foreign sales, though growing, aren't expected to offset the domestic decline.

"They all have lots of inventory sitting around," said Christopher D. Kirby, an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. The oversupply of videogame cartridges is even worse (AA, Oct. 17).

Videogame marketers insist that, although sales are sliding, there will be a market for several years. The young male group, particularly teens, wants the superior game play and large library of game titles that home computers do not offer yet.

Slow videogame sales probably will result in a 30% to 50% decline in advertising during the peak Christmas selling season, when about half of the category's advertising is unleashed. But soaring home computer advertising is more than making up for videogame advertising losses.

In the battered videogame console market, Mattel Electronics is the biggest loser. Sales of Mattel's Intellivision slowed to a trickle, forcing the retail price down to about $70 when a $50 factory rebate is factored in. Intellivision once sold for more than $200 at retail.

Mattel's competitors have reduced prices to a lesser extent. Atari, the Warner Communications subsidiary, is offering a $30 rebate. Coleco Industries is advertising $150 in travel discounts with purchases of ColecoVision.

Free game cartridges are included with all consoles as another inducement.

"To the extent there is a winner this year, it would be Coleco," Mr. Kirby said. He estimates ColecoVision has sold about 1.5 million units, besting Atari 5200 sales of 1 million units in the past year. Atari 2600 sales were between 1.5 million and 2 million, according to Mr. Kirby.

Videogame console sales

Year	Units 000,000	Average price/unit (wholesale)	Gross sales (wholesale) 000,000
1982	8.0	$123	$1,000
1983	5.5	$85	$470
1984	4.0	$60	$240

"Coleco really took market share away from Mattel," Mr. Kirby said. Mattel, which had been selling more than 1 million units annually, sold about 400,000 units in the same period that ColecoVision sold 1.5 million.

Though Atari slipped in console sales, it still holds more than 50% of the market when sales for the 2600, the system that pioneered the category, and 5200, introduced last year, are combined, Mr. Kirby said.

Mattel's troubles are deep. Intellivision, introduced in 1980, has been surpassed by the newer Atari and Coleco videogame and home computer units in 1983 sales. Mattel's bright hope for regaining momentum, its Aquarius home computer targeted for Christmas, has been withdrawn.

Mattel's losses, $176.5 million in the first six months ended July 30 on revenues of $424.4 million, may force it to withdraw from the electronics field, many analysts believe.

Likewise, Atari has posted major losses, and parent Warner Communications reported a $424.7 million loss during the first nine months on revenues of $2.4 billion. However, Atari has introduced two new home computer products, giving it a fighting chance at a turn-

TARGET/AID SEPARATES THE MEN FROM THE BOYS

Even the men 18-24 from the boys 18-24. Not to mention the boys from the girls, the old money from the new money, the Mercedes set from the tractor set from the Mercedes and tractor set.... In fact, TARGET/AID helps to define audiences to a degree never possible before.

TARGET/AID℠ uses ClusterPlus,℠ a powerful marketing segmentation tool developed by Donnelley Marketing Information Services and Simmons Market Research Bureau, to profile a market or an audience by lifestyle characteristics. That gives you a big advantage over just age and sex demographics, because lifestyles are much better indicators of the products and services consumers are likely to buy.

TARGET/AID can bring a whole new perspective to broadcast advertising. Now you can determine more than just the specific demographics of a broadcast audience; you can see what kind of consumers those numbers represent.

TARGET/AID lets you sharpen and refine your sales and marketing approach. You can differentiate stations, programming and formats from others with seemingly identical audience ratings. Even markets with similar rankings can be totally different when you examine the lifestyles of their populations. TARGET/AID is the tool that allows you to pinpoint those audience differences and use them to your advantage.

That means agencies can make better media recommendations and you can spend your advertising dollars more effectively.

So whether your audience drives a tractor, or a Mercedes or both, TARGET/AID can help you identify your targets and deliver them more efficiently. Because TARGET/AID defines audiences like never before.

World affairs supplant worry over economy

consumer watch

By LEO J. SHAPIRO
and DWIGHT BOHMBACH

Americans' worries about international affairs and war have supplanted worries over recession and unemployment: 47% of Americans now name international affairs and war as a national problem, up 15 points between August and September. In August, 48% were worried about recession and unemployment; now only 39% are.

As they feel more confident about jobs and future income, the September Advertising Age Consumer Poll finds consumers planning to buy during the coming year at percentages as high or higher than those found in August.

Proportions of consumers who report actively shopping (going out to visit dealers and comparing prices) for new cars, used cars and major appliances also went up between August and September.

Sometimes when people are planning major purchases they "scrimp" on smaller ones day-to-day. Not now. Six in 10 Americans tell us they are not holding back on day-to-day purchases. We've found this same level of daily purchasing now for the past six months.

One short-term stimulus for all this planning, shopping and buying is the fact that two in three Americans don't expect anyone at their house to get laid off or have hours or pay cut during the coming year. This is the highest level of employment security seen across the country in 17 months.

Almost half (48%) say they expect their household income to go up during the coming year—though the 31% who expect even this higher income to keep pace with living costs is a bit lower than last quarter (33%).

After a year of uncertainty, nearly three-fourths of Americans (74%) find themselves as well off financially (38%) or even better off (36%) than they were a year ago. Looking ahead, almost nine in 10 (86%) expect to be as well off (37%) or better off (49%) a year from now. Most (53%) expect the overall economic picture for the nation to improve in the year ahead.

As often happens, there's also some bitter with the better. Consumers are planning purchases and expect to have money and credit enough to make them, but there are signs of consumer reticence about actually signing on the dotted line for big-ticket items.

For the first time in five months, a majority of Americans (52%) said "now is not a good time to make a major purchase," up three points from August. That's still not a high level of resistance compared to the 67% found a year ago—but the short-term trend is in the wrong direction.

Eight in 10 consumers said there's nothing they want to buy now to take advantage of current prices. Only 32% are considering using borrowed money or credit for a major purchase—down a sharp six points from August.

The biggest per cent of consumers in 13 months (42%) tell us they expect "the same or higher" inflation in months ahead, compared to only 31% in the second-quarter 1983.

Sixty-nine per cent expect to pay more for a new car a year from now; 63% expect housing prices to go higher; 46% expect interest rates on major purchases to climb.

Each of these figures is higher than a year ago. If prices and interest rates were lower than they are, this sort of consumer expectation of rising costs could spur more buying.

But few consumers now consider $8,000 economy cars and $70,000 basic homes bargains worth hustling out to grab before they go higher.

Forty per cent of consumers now say they plan to save more money in the year ahead—the highest level seen in almost six years.

As always, retailers, like fishermen, must be ready to "catch fish whenever the fish decide to run."

In the short term, consumer buying may very well bob up or down from month to month and quarter to quarter in response to government and banker manipulations. But in the longer run, we continue to expect substantial growth in consumer spending.

With millions of baby-boom-generation men and women in their once-in-a-lifetime homemaking, baby-making years, just over one in five Americans of all ages (22%) wants babies. Among those under the age of 50 years, 27% want babies.

National research shows that among consumers under the age of 25 years, more women (66%) than men (56%) want babies.

After the age of 25 years, more men than women want babies, with the gap being particularly severe among the 30-to-34-year-olds where over twice as many men (35%) as women (15%) want babies.

Babies make needs. Needs make sales. The sales behind these figures could fuel a big buying boom. In-depth data shows that among consumers under the age of 50 years, the baby-wanters have higher income and much higher buying intentions than do Americans who don't want babies now—even after baby-wanters are statistically equalized in terms of their age and sex with those who do not want babies.

Two in three "baby-wanters" earn over $20,000; one in three earns more than $30,000. Twenty-two per cent plan to buy a house during the coming year, 26% a new car, 31% furniture, 20% major appliances, 9% stereos/hi-fis and 10% color tvs.

All these figures on buying plans among "baby-wanter" Americans are 30% or more higher than among people of comparable age and sex who do not want babies now.

This enormous pool of potential buying power is going to have to be satisfied in the next few years. It can't wait much longer.

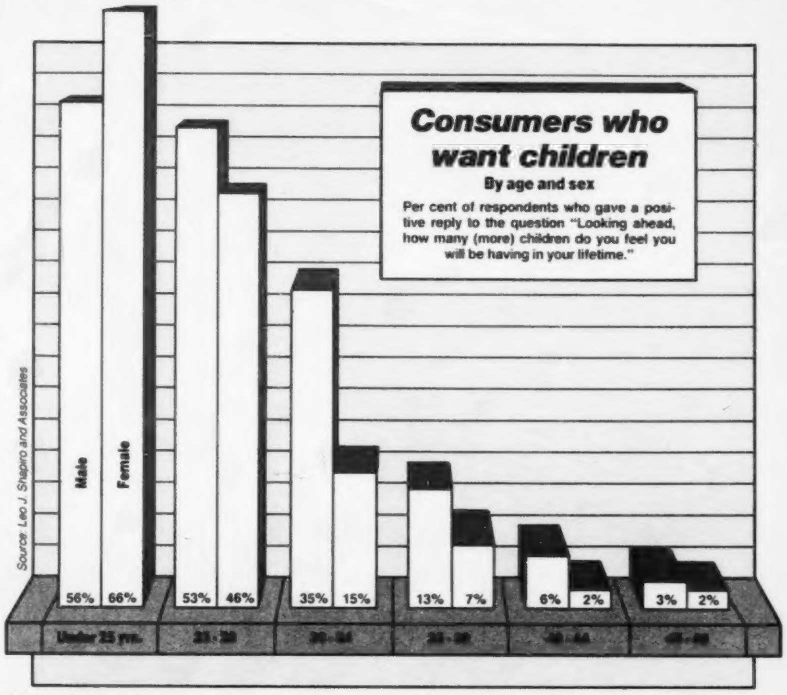
Meanwhile, what can be expected in cash registers during the coming holiday season? So far, the consumer response looks very good.

Consumer spending plans for this Christmas are up sharply from record low levels we found in September, 1982.

One in five consumers (20%) expects to spend more for Christmas this year than last, four points above expectations last year at this time.

Almost two in five (36%) expect to spend "about the same" this year—two points above expectations last year.

The proportion expecting to spend more (20%), or at least the same (36%), for Christmas this year compared to last is the highest seen in three years.#



Consumers who say they want to have children (27% of those under 50) are in general more affluent and plan more major purchases than the total population.

Business is looking sunny

More than 100 research executives representing 73 member companies congregated at the Scanticon-Princeton Executive Conference Center, Princeton, N.J., Sept. 28 to 30, for the eighth annual Workshop of CASRO (Council of American Survey Research Organizations).

CASRO members were warmed by some upbeat business trend data that showed bookings of new studies increased 10.9% in 1982.

In addition to basking in some beautiful autumn weather, CASRO members were also warmed by some upbeat business trend data, which are developed via a confidential survey of survey research companies. Sales (bookings of new studies) increased 10.9% in 1982 over 1981, according to the latest study, which was based on 61 participating companies.

Medium-size companies (annual revenues between $1.5 million and $6 million) had the best growth record—up 16.3%. Large companies (sales under $1.5 million) were up 3.1%—significantly lower than the inflation rate in 1982 (6.1%, according to the U.S. Department of Labor's Consumer Price Index-U).

More current data, based on reporting from 72 companies, showed that the second quarter of 1983 was up 15% over the same period in 1982.

A main business item at CASRO each year is the election of a new board of directors. Newly elected chairman for the coming year is Richard McCullough, president of Winona Research, Minneapolis.

Chairman-elect (for 1985) is Thomas Lea Davidson, president of Davidson-Peterson Associates, New York.

Other board members are: Joseph F. Baldi, president, Directions for Decisions, New York, treasurer; Pieter P. de Kadt, president of de Kadt Marketing and Research, Greenwich, Conn., secretary; Kathleen Knight, executive vp, Behavioral Analysis Inc., Irvington, N.Y.; Dexter Needle, vp, Audits & Surveys, New York, and Foy N. Conway, president, Conway/Milliken Corp., Chicago. Diane Bowers continues as executive director of CASRO.

The CASRO program, put together by Foy N. Conway, chairman of the annual workshop committee, included two outside speakers. Priscilla Kamrath of Walker Research and current president of MRA (Marketing Research Assn.) made a speech closely allied with the CASRO workshop theme, "Growth Through Interaction." She commented on the increasing importance of MRA/CASRO joint projects and described the 1984 plans for the annual Marketing Research Week industry publicity program, which was instigated by MRA in 1983 and strongly supported by CASRO and individual CASRO member companies.

The after-dinner speaker this year was Jack H. Honomichl, research columnist at ADVERTISING AGE, who discussed some of the current industry trends as they relate to the special interests of CASRO's membership.

Two observers, Yvan Corbeil and Michael Adams, from CAMRO (Canadian Assn. of Marketing Research Organizations) attended CASRO for the first time this year as special guests. Also, 13 exhibitors—almost all suppliers of hardware and software customized for the research industry—sponsored booths.

Betsy Bikoff of Walker Research and Robert E. Shaw of Burke Marketing Services reported on the results of an annual membership survey of financial compensation trends in the industry. Based on 55 cooperating companies, the analysis showed that the average salary increases, from April, 1982, to March, 1983, ranged from 2.5% to 9.9%.

In 1984, CASRO will depart from its tradition of meeting annually in either the greater New York or Chicago areas. Sept. 19 to 21, the 9th annual workshop will be held at McCormick Ranch, Scottsdale, Ariz. Program chairman will be Marvin W. Baiman, president of R. H. Bruskin Associates, New Brunswick, N.J.

Board members: Herb Abelson; Joe Goldstein; Pieter de Kadt; Harry O'Neill, chairman; Foy Conway; John Rupp, counsel and Dexter Neadle.

Shifts

a new instrument enables you to see many, many things that you could never see before."

For example, Diane Schmalensee, director-research operations at the Marketing Science Institute in Cambridge, Mass., points to recent efforts by researchers to use scanner data to produce "perceptual maps" that can tell a marketer where a brand stands competitively. "By looking at the substitutions people make with variations in price, you can make statements like, 'This brand is like that brand, but far away from that other brand,'" she says.

As the cost of primary research mounts and as the amount and availability of such "secondary" databases increases, researchers who can come up with such innovative uses of existing databases will be increasingly in demand.

Such innovative techniques, however, require "a good theoretical base, an understanding of underlying marketing theory, of how the consumer acts and how advertising works," says Ms. Schmalensee. "There are a lot of data handlers [in market research] who know how to handle data but don't know what it means. You get huge amounts of data from the new technologies, and you need researchers who have an understanding of the bigger picture before they start wading into the data."

Such an understanding of marketing management principles also will prove invaluable as more and more organizations set up internal management information systems and inhouse databases for management use.

"You have to get the information into the database, and you have to have someone do it who understands the bigger picture, who knows what data should be in there and who knows what form it should be in so that it will be useful for decision making," says Ms. Schmalensee.

The establishment of such inhouse data systems also presents the research community with an opportunity to expand its role as an information provider. For example, market researchers have the opportunity to integrate their market-type data with other types of information—macroeconomic figures on such things as interest rates, housing starts and industry projections.

Again, the market researcher who can take advantage of this opportunity will need a different mix of skills than is generally emphasized today.

"I think that one will find 'bridge people' in the sense that these are people who are skilled enough at research to understand the research on its own terms, managerially oriented enough that they will be able to serve as translators between line management and the more typical researchers," says Mr. Greyser. "This new role may turn out to be transitional. Five or ten years from now, you may find that MBAs have had more training in market research than most of today's programs give."

At the same time that new opportunities are opening, new challenges are emerging. Corporate data processing operations, for example, may challenge market research's efforts to take the "information provider" function under its wing. "I see a real danger that research departments may become data-driven and just become research suppliers," says Ms. Schmalensee.

The research community could also learn from the computer-related experiences of professionals in other fields.

"We have looked at things like computer-aided design [CAD], which has been an accepted tool for at least a decade," says Ennius E. Bergsma, principal with the McKinsey & Co. consulting company. "We have found, by really going back and seeing what these systems have done, that, in fact, they haven't really increased productivity that much. If a designer or engineer sits down at a terminal before thinking very much about the problem and makes a first design, then refines it and refines it, if the initial framework in which the guy was thinking is wrong, then all that CAD does is enable you to make the best out of a difficult situation.

"I see that same type of danger developing in the gizmos that market researchers are developing."

Or perhaps the introduction of mainframe computers into the corporate world can also serve as an illuminating example. "When the mainframes came along, everyone predicted that people would disappear and all you would do is spit out sales reports," recalls Florence Skelly, president of the Yankelovich, Skelly & White research and consulting company. "What actually happened was that thousands of MBAs were hired to interpet the garbage. It didn't reduce the jobs, it changed the nature of the jobs. It made them more professional and higher-paid. All the little ladies with gray hair and hairnets went, and, instead you got the MBAs."

closeups of the faces of "real" people who talk about their lives and Anacin's ability to take care of the headaches that come with their jobs. The initial series of spots has featured a waitress, a coal miner, a teacher and a farmer. William Esty Co. is the agency.

A Whitehall spokesman said that while "the technique is a new one for us and probably for the whole analgesic market," the message that Anacin is a fast, effective pain reliever continues unchanged.

Five additional spots will begin airing soon, according to the spokesman. The new characters are a school headmistress, a professional football player, a housewife, a cowboy and a welder.

The increased advertising awareness for Anacin comes as AHP, in its continuing share battle with analgesic-market leader Tylenol, is preparing for over-the-counter sales of ibuprofen, the largest-selling prescription remedy for arthritis. AHP plans to market the drug under the brand name Advil as soon as the Food & Drug Administration gives final approval (AA, Sept. 26).

Tylenol, with 30% of sales in the otc analgesic market to second-place Anacin's 13%, continued to lead the category in advertising awareness. In September, 33% of survey respondents named Tylenol advertising as the first to come to mind, up slightly more than 1 point from August. Advertising for Bayer aspirin, replaced in second place by Anacin last month, was the third most often named with a 6.2% share.

AdWatch is a joint project of ADVERTISING AGE and SRI Research Center, Lincoln, Neb. Ad awareness is measured by asking a national random sample of consumers to name the advertising that first comes to mind of all seen, heard or read during the past 30 days.

From Sept. 1 through 20, 1,250 people were questioned by phone. Under adWatch methodology, an increase or decrease of 2.8 percentage points is considered statistically significant and attributable to more than sample variations.

The largest single increase in ad awareness last month and the only significant decline were registered in the soft-drink category.

Coca-Cola, whose advertising has been highlighting the introduction of a caffeine-free version, was mentioned first by 32.1% of the sample, up 5.1 points from August. The increase gave Coke the highest awareness share recorded to date among the tightly bunched soft-drink brands.

Pepsi-Cola remained in the No. 2 spot with a 26.4% of first mentions. 7UP managed to hold on to the No. 3 spot with its anti-additive message, but its 5.9% was off nearly 3 points from August.

With a new, tougher ad campaign set to begin soon (AA, Oct. 17), Diet Coke, with 5% of first mentions in September, threatens to move ahead of 7UP into the top three.

Among significant changes in other categories last month:

- Burger King's "MacDonald Family" and other spots in its "The switch is on" campaign appear to have caught consumers' attention and have given the No. 2 fast-food chain some renewed momentum. After declining from 21% of mentions in March to 14.4% in August, Burger King's awareness rose 3.3 points to 17.7% in September.

That growth seems to have come largely from consumers who normally pay little attention to fast-food advertising, since leader McDonald's share remained nearly unchanged at 45%. McDonald's advertising was dominated by "McNugget Mania" last month.

No. 3 Wendy's returned to its humorous Joe Sedelmaier-produced spots last month and lost some of the increase in awareness its "Only Wendy's" campaign generated the previous month. Its September share was 6.1%, down from 7.9%.

- A new campaign for General Foods' Maxwell House coffee boosted awareness of that product's advertising 4 points (to 21.6% of mentions) and moved it into the No. 1 position in the coffee & tea category. It features a series of vignettes in which a photographer and his dog roam the country encountering beautiful scenery, friendly people and Maxwell House.

Procter & Gamble's Folger's brand, with a 1 point decline in ad awareness, slipped back to No. 2. First mentions of Lipton advertising slid 2 points, although its 10.7% share was enough to keep it ahead of Sanka (7.4%).

- In the cameras & photographic equipment category, a 2.9 point jump to 15.9% of first mentions gave No. 2 Canon its greatest share of top-of-mind awareness to date. The surge comes without any major change in advertising direction or message last month.

Eastman Kodak, which had boosted awareness with a midsummer promotion and new disc camera drive, continues to have the most-often mentioned advertising in the category. But its 31.8% September share was off 2.5 points from August. Polaroid remains in the No. 3 slot with a 7.9% share.

- Apple Computer's advertising asserting it was the first to perfect the personal computer and it remains the leader with its Apple IIe and Lisa models was mentioned first by 9.4% of consumers in September, a 2.8 point increase. That helped it close the gap with perpetual home electronics category leader Atari, whose advertising came to mind first for 13.4% of the sample. General Electric was a distant third with a 4.8% share.

- Stroh Brewery Co.'s "Alex the dog" spot in which a dog is sent to fetch his owner a beer but then is heard off-camera apparently drinking the beer himself earned Stroh's a place among the top 10 in over-all awareness in September.

When the 1,250 adults were asked to name the first ad that came to mind from all they had seen, heard or read, the following, in order, were mentioned most often: (1) Coca-Cola; (2) Pepsi-Cola; (3) Miller/Miller Lite; (4) McDonald's; (5) Burger King; (6) Ford; (7) Stroh's; (8) Budweiser/Bud Light; (9) Tide; (10) Levi's.#

Bungy jumpers set to leap into tv spots

By FRED DANZIG

NEW YORK—The bungy jumpers ("boinnng") have landed ("boinnng") on Madison Avenue ("boinnng boinnng").

Six jumpers, members of Britain's celebrated Dangerous Sports Club, have arrived in town, their rubberized, elastic ropes, jump shoes and rigging in tow. They began calling on ad agencies in hopes of picking up, or jumping into, tv commercials work.

Led by petite-but-fearless Janie Wilmot, the jumpers have their press clippings and ideas for specific stunts they are willing to perform to call attention to a product.

In the U.S. in recent years, they have jumped off the Golden Gate Bridge and rappelled their way down Royal Gorge Bridge.

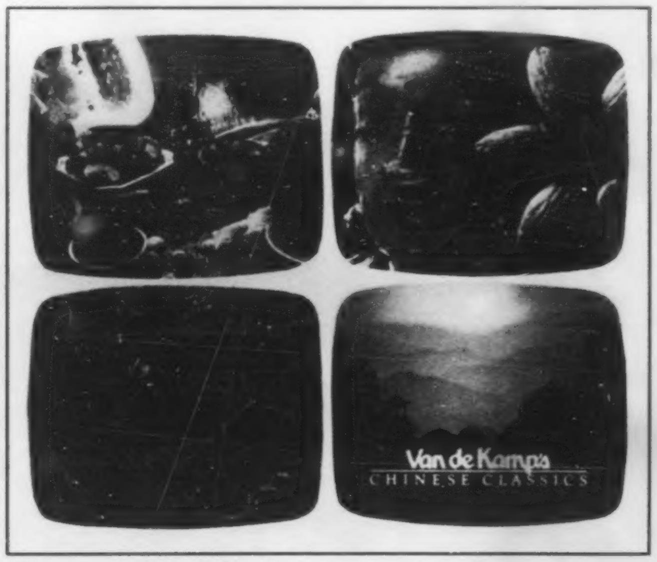
They are called bungy (as in spongy) jumpers because they employ the elastic bungy ropes that enable them to bounce upward just shy of impact with the river or rocks below.

Ms. Wilmot, hardened to the ways of rope rappelling but unsure of how to present her schemes to agency executives, calls her team "a commercial in search of an advertiser."

She is using office building elevators as she makes her rounds, spurning suggestions of friends that she bungy in from the roofs. Like her rope, her fees are elastic. That is, bungy jumper rates depend on the assignment, she said.

Ms. Wilmot refers to "bungy jumping" as "an exciting new event where daredevil jumpers thrill crowds by plummeting earthwards on elastic ropes," in a "unique and apparently death-defying flight." She notes that if no suitable high spot is available, the team is willing to jump from high cranes or helicopters.

Ms. Wilmot recommends her high-risk jumping act to agency executives who find themselves, creatively speaking, at the end of their rope. Boinnng.#



For exotic tastes

Van de Kamp's, Long Beach, Cal., depicts exotic Chinese scenes to entice tv viewers to buy its new line of frozen Chinese entrees (AA, Oct. 17). The frozen line is getting tv spending at a $5 million national rate. Spots are being rolled out gradually from West to East Coast. DiIorio, Wergeles, New York, is the agency.

Hall & Oates ads to set record

NEW YORK—Daryl Hall, John Oates, RCA Records and Champion Entertainment aim to consolidate Hall & Oates' position as the top-selling duo in rock music annals with a multipronged blitz that will stretch well into 1984.

Although Champion, through founder/president Tommy Mottola and vp-promotion and marketing Jeb Brien, has guided the performers through more than a dozen albums and numerous tours, the biggest promotional support for one of their albums is about to break, followed by yet another tour backed by a major advertiser to the tune of $2 million-plus.

RCA Records will spend $1 million on tv alone to promote the latest Hall & Oates album, a "greatest hits" collection, between now and Jan. 1. Mr. Brien, who worked with RCA on the advertising effort, claimed that sum is the biggest yet put behind an album and should more than pay for itself in retail sales.

The album includes two new cuts that will be released as singles. It should sell 3 million copies in the U.S. by Christmas, and 7 million worldwide, the vp predicted.

The fall-winter marketing strategy, as laid out by Mr. Brien, calls for targeting young (16 to 24) consumers and Hall & Oates followers first via advertising and tv and cable programing, both specials and music videos.

The second phase, aimed at drumming up Christmas gift buyer business, will zero in on an older audience with a repeat of their last Home Box Office concert special on Dec. 7, again coupled with a syndicated radio simulcast on 300 stations.

This latter phase also will encompass pre-Christmas media buys and the playing of the hits album on November and December United Airlines flights, in a presentation hosted by an MTV "veejay." Calling the latter in-flight special a first, Mr. Brien guessed that the airline airplay alone may reach 1 million United passengers. RCA Records will tie-in by running an ad page in United in-flight magazines during both months.

Besides tv, RCA is making sizable fourth-quarter commitments in out-of-home media, namely in Foster & Kleiser outdoor locations in four of the largest auto traffic markets (New York, Atlanta, Houston and Los Angeles), TDI transit posters at 281 train stations in New York City, Long Island and Connecticut plus yuletide-related ads in shopping malls in Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Atlanta and Dallas.

Mr. Brien said the group ended its Canada Dry-sponsored 107-market tour (designed chiefly to promote the "H_20" album) in August; the soft-drink company, among 10 companies considered by Champion, spent $2 million-plus promoting that tour.

Their 1983-84 tour will begin shortly, with Champion's executives now finalizing terms with a new, unidentified tour sponsor that contacted Champion direct.

Asked if Hall & Oates might offer any of their past songs for use in commercial jingles, Mr. Brien said, "We would like to" do so with the new tour sponsor. "Canada Dry, or rather Young & Rubicam, didn't respond to our offer to cut a track or use existing music."

Bridging 1983 and '84 will be the two new singles, the first ("Say It Isn't So") due later this year and the other planned for spring. Also in spring '84, as the global tour continues, RCA will market a new album. Helping keep a high profile for Hall & Oates well into 1984 will be MTV, which Mr. Brien said will designate the duo as its "group of the summer."#

'Video revolution' overthrows profits

By JAMES P. FORKAN

NEW YORK—The so-called "new video revolution" has been somewhat revolting for a number of companies, based on their third-quarter financial results.

Cable properties helped drain profits at ABC Inc. and Warner Communications, and the latter also was hit hard by problems in the videogame and home computer fields.

Time Inc. earnings dropped because of the now-defunct TV-Cable Week and Time's subscription tv operations, a field it now plans to avoid. The company's main cable interests were hefty contributors to Time's financial health.

At ABC Inc., ABC Video Enterprises reported third-quarter losses of $12 million vs. $10 million in the like 1982 quarter as revenues edged slightly upward.

The company acknowledged that the "softness in the over-all cable advertising environment" slowed progress of its ad-supported cable tv services. Developmental costs for TeleFirst, its in-home entertainment recording service to be tested early next year, also contributed to costs.

ABC's tv profits on the network and the owned-stations levels were affected adversely by "a weaker news marketplace," higher costs to reformat its late-night news programing, increased news coverage, plus softer local advertising demand and a rise in local program production costs.

At Warner Communications, Atari's videogame woes were the primary reason for the parent's losses thus far in 1983. A $122.4 million loss for the third quarter and a $424.7 million loss for the nine months—in sharp contrast to net incomes of $78.7 million and $224.8 million in the corresponding 1982 periods—set off another round of negative coverage in the financial press. Atari's difficulties, or at least Warner's admission of them, broke in December.

Warner leveled the bulk of the blame for the losses at "the continuing chaotic marketplaces for videogames, home computers and coin-operated [arcade] games, including distress sales of inventory by companies leaving the business."

Warner did not dwell much on Warner Amex Cable Communications and Warner Amex Satellite Entertainment Co. in the third-quarter statement. It did say those joint ventures with American Express Co. "continued at a loss in the third quarter," but those cable tv operations and the two-way Qube service continued to consume millions of dollars.

Videogames also caused trouble at CBS Inc., where the third-quarter report was a good one except for CBS/Columbia Group, which encompasses the toy, musical instrument and videogame/computer software operations.

That group's $15.7 million loss in the third quarter, up from a quarterly loss of just $500,000 in 1982, was blamed by CBS on the troubled marketplace for videogames.

RCA Corp. emerged from the third quarter in healthy shape over-all, as NBC and the communications, electronics and transportation services divisions all notched record sales. Sales in the communications sector soared 19%, but that unit's earnings dipped.

Videocassette and tv set sales contributed to gains by the consumer electronics division, while the broadcast systems unit sold fewer video recorders and cameras to tv stations and networks.

Cable boosted financial results from Capital Cities Communications and Cox Communications.

New video was praised for contributing to MGM/UA Home Entertainment Group's latest results.

At Taft Broadcasting Co., the TCI-Taft Cablevision Associates cable venture reported that many of its 14 systems (with 148,000 basic subscribers and 62,000 pay) were added in the past 12 months. That venture's quarterly loss of $671,000 was lower than projected.#

Videogames tighten aim around of its operations.

Expandability and peripherals (optional accessories) are the cornerstone of advertising geared for the peak Christmas selling season. All three marketers offer adapters that allow their consoles to play cartridges for Atari's 2600, which has the largest installed base.

Ads for ColecoVision pitch a computer accessory package retailing for about $450 that makes the game into an Adam, Coleco's new home computer. "We do not make the distinction between videogames and home computers as many others do," said Morton Handel, Coleco exec vp.

Meanwhile, Mattel is offering a computer accessory that is expected to sell for about $100.

Though the installed base of Intellivision is about 3 million units, larger than ColecoVision's 1.5 million, Intellivision is less active because it has been in the market longer, Mr. Kirby said.

There are about 13 million Atari 2600 units and another 1 million 5200 units in the marketplace.

Mr. Kirby said peripherals, such as computer expanders, cartridge adapters and sophisticated controllers, are high-profit items that are getting a big push this Christmas. But such accessories represent only 10% of videogame sales, he said.#

Atari line to play off rivals

SUNNYVALE, CAL.—Atari is enlarging sales of software, the big profit center of videogame marketers, by offering its popular games in formats for competitors' equipment.

The new line, marketed under the AtariSoft name, is for Mattel's Intellivision and Coleco Industries' ColecoVision, which are Atari's chief videogame competitors.

AtariSoft also will be offering videogames compatible with the following computers: International Business Machine's PC, Commodore 64 and VIC 20, Apple II and Texas Instrument's 99/4A.

The move comes as Intellivision and ColecoVision introduce adapter accessories that enable them to play game cartridges formatted for Atari's 2600.

The AtariSoft agency is Needham, Harper & Steers/-USA, New York.#
